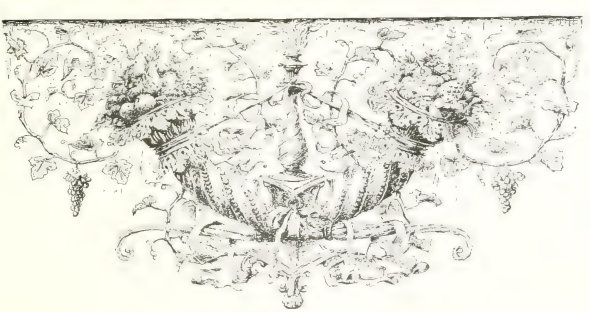
Fuzuli. See the extract.



> Up to this time all Ottoman writings had been more or less rugged and unpolished; but in the reign of Selim's son, Suleyman I. (1520–1566), a new era began. Two great poets, Fuzuli and Baki, make their appearance about the same time: the one in the east, the other in the west, of the now far-extending empire. Fuzuli of Baghdad, one of the four great poets of the old Turkish school, is the first writer of real eminence who rose in the Ottoman dominions. None of his predecessors in any way approaches him; and although his work is in the Persian style and taste, he is no servile copier; on the contrary, he struck out for himself a new path, one hitherto untrodden by either Turk or Persian. His chief characteristic is an intense and passionate earnestness, which sometimes betrays him into extravagances; and although few Turkish poets are in one way more artificial than he, few seem to speak more directly from the heart. His best-known works consist of his "Divan," or collection of ghazels, and a poem on the loves of Leyli and Mejnun: he has besides some prose writings, which are hardly inferior to his verse.

Gades (gā'dēz), or Gadeira (gą-dī'rą). [L. Gades, Gr. Γάδειρα (pl.), Κάδειρα, orig. Phœn., 'inclosure.'] The remotest colony of the Phœnicians in the west. It was founded about 1100 B. C. beyond Gibraltar at the northwestern extremity of an island, about 12 miles long, which lies off the western coast of Spain, and occupied almost exactly the same site as the modern Cadiz. It was the headquarters of the western commerce of the Phœnicians, and contained various temples of the Phœnician gods. See Cadiz.

Gades or Cadiz which has kept its name and its unbroken position as a great city from an earlier time than any other city in Europe. Freeman, Hist. Geog., p. 35.

Of these by far the most important was Gadeira. This town was situated at the northwestern extremity of an island, about twelve miles long, which lies off the western coast of Spain a little outside the straits. A narrow channel, more like a river than an arm of the sea, and now spanned by a bridge, separates the island from the shore, expanding, however, towards its northern end, where it forms itself into a land-locked bay, capable of containing all the navies of the world. Two islets lie across the mouth of the channel at this end, and effectually prevent the entrance of the long rolling waves from the Atlantic. The original city was small, and inclosed within a strong wall, whence the name "Gadir" or "Gadeira," which meant in the Phœnician language "an enclosure" or "a fortified place." It occupied almost exactly the site of the modern Cadiz, being spread over the northern end of the island, the little islet of the Trocadero, and ultimately over a portion of the opposite coast. It contained temples of Eh, Melkarth, and Ashtoreth or Astarte.

Rawlinson, Phœnicia, p. 67.

Gadhels (gad'ėlz). [See Gael.] That branch of the Celtic race which comprises the Erse of Ireland, the Gaels of Scotland, and the Manx of the Isle of Man, as distinguished from the Cymric branch. See Cymry. Ireland was the first home of the Gadhelic branch, whence it spread to Scotland in the 6th century—a portion of the branch, under the name of Scots, having then settled in Argyll. The Scots ultimately became the dominant race, the Picts, an earlier and probably a Cymric race, being lost in them.

After the old way of inventing persons to explain the names of tribes, the name of Gaedhel was derived by the ancient Irish clergy from a Gaedhal or Gadelas who lived in the time of Moses. His father, Niul, had married a daughter of that Pharaoh who, in pursuit of the Israelites, was drowned in the Red Sea, and called her Scota because he was himself a Scythian. Their son was said to have been called Gaodhal as a lover of learning, from gaoith, which is in Irish "learning," and dil, which is in Irish "love."

Morley, English Writers, I. 166.

Galacz. See Galatz.

Galahad (gal'a-had), Sir. The noblest and purest knight of the Round Table. The character was invented by Walter Map in the "Quest of the Graal."

Sir Galahad, Map's ideal knight, was the son of Sir Launcelot and Elaine, the son of Pelles, and was descended from Joseph of Arimathea. Launcelot was the only knight who had been approached, but not taken, of the order of the Round Table. The attitude of Sir Galahad as the questing knight-errant and the table with the Holy Graal in the midst, leaving one seat vacant, as that which the Lord had occupied, and which was reserved for a descendant of Joseph, named Galahad: "Whatever man else shall attempt to set in the place of Galahad the earth swallowed. It was called therefore the Siege Perilous. When men became sinful, the Holy Graal, visible only to pure eyes, disappeared. Its recovery depended the honour and peace of England: but only Sir Galahad, who at the appointed time was brought to the knights by a miraculous old man clothed in white, and placed in the Siege Perilous—only the pure Sir Galahad succeeded in the quest.

Morley, English Writers, III. 142.

She hid herself among the willows in order to be followed. In literature, a type of coquetry.—3. A statue animated by Venus in answer to the prayer of Pygmalion. She has nothing to do with the legend of Acis and Galatea. See Pygmalion and Galatea.

Galatea. 1. A prose pastoral with lyrics, by Cervantes, said to have been inspired by the lady who afterward became his wife. It was written about 1583. A second part was promised, but was not written.

Like other works of the same sort, the Galatea (of Cervantes) is founded on an affectation which can never be successful, and which in this particular instance, from the lack of accumulation and involution of the stories in its fable, from the conceited metaphysics with which it is disfigured, and from the poor poetry profusely scattered through it, is more than usually unfortunate. Perhaps no one of the many pastoral tales produced in Spain in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries fails so much in the form it should maintain.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., II. 99.

2. A play by John Lyly, printed in 1592.—3. A romantic pastoral by Florian, imitated from Cervantes, published in 1783.

Galba (gal'bä). Servius Sulpicius. Born Dec. 24, 3 B. C.: died at Rome, Jan. 15, A. D. 69. A Roman emperor. He became praetor in 20 and consul in 33. He was governor of Upper Germany in 39, and became governor of Africa in 45, and governor of Hispania Tarraconensis in 61. In 68, learning that Nero had given secret orders for his assassination, he joined the insurrection of C. Julius Vindex, and was proclaimed emperor. Vindex was defeated, and killed himself, but Galba prevailed through the consequences of a revolt in his favor of the pretorians at Rome. His refusal of the donatives which had been promised in his name, and his adoption of Piso Licinianus as his successor instead of Salvius Otho who had helped to place him, provoked a revolt among the pretorians which resulted in his assassination and the elevation of Otho.

Gale (gāl), Roger. Born 1672: died June 25, 1744. An English antiquary, son of Thomas Gale, dean of York.

Gale, Theophilus. Born at King's Teignton, Devonshire, England, 1628: died at Newington, London, in Feb. or March, 1678. An English nonconformist divine. Gallienus (gal-i-ē′nus, Publius Licinius Valerianus Egnatius. Died at Milan, 268. A Roman emperor, son of Valerian. He was admitted to a share in the government on the elevation of his father in 253, and became sole emperor on the capture of the latter by the Persians in 260. He made no effort to secure the release of his father, but devoted himself to a life of indolence and luxury, while the frontiers of the empire were everywhere invaded by the barbarians, especially by the Goths and the Persians. He appears to have undertaken a tardy expedition against the Persians in 265, when he was recalled by the insurrection of Aureolus, whom he shut up in Milan. He was murdered by his own soldiers while pressing the siege of that city.

All these invasions of the Goths occurred under the reign of the Emperor Gallienus, that celebrated Valerian, who took both the captivity of his father (Valerian) and the rapid dismemberment of his Empire with such shameful composure and serenity. Egypt revolted: the usurpers to him. "Is it revolted," "What of that? Cannot we dispense with Egyptian flax?" "Several earthquakes have happened in Asia Minor, and the Cities of Achaia lie all in ruins." "But we cannot do without Lydian sulphur?" "When Gaul was lost he gave a merry laugh and said, "Do you think the Republic will be in danger if the Consuls' lictors cannot be loaded with Gallish tartan?" Hodgkin. Italy and her Invaders, I 59.

Game at Chess, A. A comedy or satirical drama by Thomas Middleton, produced before or by 1624.

The actors at the Globe had produced Middleton's "Game at Chess," in which the action is carried on by black and white pieces, representing the Reformed and Romanist parties. The latter, being the pagtes of the piece, are foiled, and put in the bag." The Spanish envoy's complaint was founded on the fact that living persons were represented by the actors, such persons being the King of Spain, Gondomar, and the famous Antonio de Dominis, who, after being a Romish bishop (of Spalatro), professed Protestantism, became Dean of Windsor, and after all died in his earlier faith, at Rome. On the ambassador's complaint, the actors and the author were summoned before the council, but no immediate result followed; for, two days later, Nethercole writes to Carleton informing him that "the comedy in which the whole Spanish business is taken up, is drawing £100 nightly."
Decan. Enc. Stage, I. 25.

Gamelyn (gam'e-lin). Tale of. A poem added to the list of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" by Urry. It is supposed that Chaucer had it in hand to use as material for some poem of his own, and that it was reproduced as his by someone who found it among his papers.

It found its way at last into dramatic form, through Lodge's "Rosalynde," in Shakespeare's "As You Like It," and Shakespeare himself is said to have played his version of the part of Adam Spencer, who appears also in Gamelyn.

He wrote a life of Roger Williams (1846).

Gammer Gurton's Needle. A comedy by Bishop Still. It was acted at Christ's College, Cambridge, in 1566, and printed in 1575. Owing to Warton's mistake in supposing that it was printed in 1551, it was for some time thought to be the first English comedy. "Ralph Roister Doister" preceded it.

As for the story, it is of the simplest, turning merely on the losing of her needle by Gammer Gurton as she was mending her man Hodge's breeches, on the search for it by the household, on the tricks by which Dyccon the Bedlam (the clown or "vice" of the piece) induces a quarrel between Gammer and her neighbours, and on the final finding of the needle in the exact place in which Gammer Gurton's industry had been employed.

Ganda (gän'dä), or Baganda (bä-gan'dä). An important African nation occupying the northwestern shore of Lake Victoria. They call themselves Baganda, their country Buganda, and their language Luganda. By the Snahili they are called Waganda, Hima, or Wahuma, and their language Kiganda. The royal family is of the Huma tribe of the Galla nation. The people are Bantu, and form one of the finest looking and most intelligent races in the interior. Their ordinary huts are made of grass. The villages are surrounded by quadrangular stockades. The principal fruit is the banana. The women are more numerous than the men, owing to the custom of raiding neighboring tribes, killing or selling the men, and keeping the women. Before the advent of Europeans, the Baganda were already well clad in native bark cloth, which is fast being superseded by imported cotton cloth. Marriage of near relatives is allowed, but tattooing and circumcision are forbidden. The king governs with the aid of feudal governors, a privy council (called katikiro), of three ba-kungu (ministers) and of the lu-chiko, or parliament, composed of the grandees. No idols are worshiped, but the spirit of the water Lubemba and the devil are feared and propitiated. Since the establishment of the English mission in 1872, and of the Catholic mission in 1879, much progress has been made, and the religion is predominantly Christian. Buganda accepted the protectorate of the British East African Company. After a civil war between Catholics and Protestants, the king was restored, and the British government took effective control in 1893. See Uganda, Mtesa, Mwanga.

Gargantua (gär-gan'tu-ä; F. pron. gär-gon-tü-ä') and Pantagruel (pan-tag'rö-el; F. pron. pon-tä-grü-el'), The Life of. A satirical work in prose and verse by Rabelais. Gargantua is a giant with enormous appetite, and his name has become proverbial for an insatiable eater. The misspelling Garagantua, originated by Pope in his edition of Shakspere's plays ("As you Like It," iii. 2), has been followed by some of the editors. (Furness.) There was a chapbook, popular in England in the 16th century, giving the history of the giant Gargantua, who accidentally swallows five pilgrims, staves and all, in his salad. See Pantagruel and Panurge.

He [Rabelais] edited too, and perhaps in part rewrote, a prose romance, "Les Grandes et Inestimables Chroniques du grant et Enorme Geant Gargantua." This work, the author of which is unknown, is one of the earlier copies of which exist, gave him no doubt at least the idea of his own famous book. The next year (1532) followed the first instalment of this — "Pantagruel Roi des Dipsodes Restitué en Son naturel avec ses Faicts et Prouesses Espouvantables." Three years afterwards came "Gargantua" proper, the first book of the entire work as we now have it. Eleven years, however, passed before the work was continued, the second book of "Pantagruel" not being published till 1546, and the third six years later, just before the author's death in 1552. The fourth or last book did not appear as a whole until 1564, though the first sixteen chapters had been given to the world two years before. This fourth book, the fifth of the entire work, has, from the length of time which elapsed before its publication and from certain variations which exist in the MS. and the first printed editions, been suspected of spuriousness. Such a question cannot be decided here at length. But there is no external testimony of sufficient value to discredit Rabelais's authorship, while the internal testimony in its favour is overwhelming. Saintsbury, Short Hist. of French Lit., p. 182.

He wrote "A Description of Germany, etc."

Gascoigne, George. Born in Westmoreland (?), England, about 1535; died at Stamford, England, Oct. 7, 1577. An English poet. His chief works are "The Steele Glas" and "The Complaint of Philomene" (1576). Works edited by E. Arber 1868.

He (Gascoigne) is supposed to have been born about 1538, and if so, he was fifty-two or forty when he died in 1577. His father, a knight of good family and estate in Sussex, divided his l ime, but he was educated at Cambridge, if not at both universities, was twice elected to Parliament, travelled and fought abroad, and took part in the famous festival at Kenilworth. His work is, as has been said, considerable, and is remarkable for the number of its attempts in English which it contains. It has at least been claimed for him though careful students of literary history know that these attributions are always rather hazardous that he wrote the first English prose comedy ("The Supposes," a version of Ariosto), the first regular verse satire ("The Steel Glass"), the first prose tale (a version from Bandello), the first translation from Greek tragedy (a version of the Iphigenia at Aulis), and the above-mentioned "Notes of Instruction"). Most of these things, it will be seen, were merely adaptations of foreign originals, but they certainly make up a remarkable budget for one man. Saintsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 96.

Gascoigne, Sir William. Died in 1419. An English judge. He was made chief justice of the King's Bench by Henry IV. about 1400. According to a tradition, followed by Shakspere in "Henry IV.," he committed Prince Henry to prison when the latter struck him for venturing to punish one of the prince's riotous companions.

Gascoigne, William. Born about 1612; died in the battle of Marston Moor, July 2, 1644. An English astronomer, inventor of the micrometer.

He invented methods of grinding glasses, and Sir Edward Sherburne states that he was the first who used two convex glasses in the telescope. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Gasconade (gas-ko-nad'). A river in Missouri which runs north and joins the Missouri below Jefferson City. Length, about 200 miles.

Gascony (gas'ko-ni), F. Gascogne (gäs-kōny'). [ME. Vasconie, Gascoyn, Sp. Vascuña, prob. from LL. Vasconia, from Vascones, the inhabitants. See Basques.] An ancient duchy of France, capital Auch, forming part of the old government of Guienne and Gascony. It was bounded by Guienne on the north, Languedoc and Foix on the east, Spain and Navarre on the south, and the Bay of Biscay on the west. It comprised the departments of Landes, Gers, and Hautes-Pyrenees, and parts of Hauts-Garonne and Ariège. It formed the Roman province of Aquitania Tertia or Novempopulana; was a duchy in the middle ages; and was united in 1052 to Guienne, the fortunes of which it generally followed.

Gaskell (gas'kel), Mrs. (Elizabeth Cleghorn Stevenson). Born at Chelsea, London, Sept. 29, 1810; died at Alton, Hampshire, England, Nov. 12, 1865. An English novelist. She removed on her marriage in 1832 to Manchester, where she obtained material for those of her novels which deal with the life and trials of the manufacturing classes. Her best novels have been translated into French. Among them are "Mary Barton" (1848), "Cranford" (1853), "North and South" (1855), "Cousin Phillis" (1865), "Wives and Daughters" (1866), etc. She published in 1857 a "Life of Charlotte Brontë."

Gate of the Mountains. The gorge in which the Missouri breaks through the Rocky Mountains, about 40 miles above Great Falls, Montana.

Gates (gats), Horatio. Born at Maldon, England, in 1728; died at New York, April 10, 1806. An American general. He served as captain under Braddock in the expedition against Fort Duquesne in 1755, and at the close of the old French and Indian war settled in Berkeley county, Virginia. At the beginning of the Revolutionary War he accepted a commission as adjutant-general in the Continental army (1775), and in 1777 succeeded Schuyler as commander in the north. He defeated Burgoyne in the second battle of Stillwater, Oct. 7, 1777, and on Oct. 17 received the surrender of Burgoyne at Saratoga. In Nov., 1777, he was made president of the board of war and ordnance, a position which he used to further an intrigue with the clique known as the "county Cabal," consisting of Thomas Conway and others, to supplant Washington in the chief command of the army. In June, 1780, he was appointed to the command in the south, and on May 16, 1780, totally defeated by Lord Cornwallis at Camden, South Carolina. He was afterward succeeded by General Greene.

Gates, Sir Thomas. Died after 1621. A colonial governor of Virginia. Along with Captain Newport and Sir George Somers he sailed from England in May, 1609, in charge of 900 emigrants destined for Virginia. During the voyage the Sea Venture, in which he sailed, was separated from the rest of the fleet by a hurricane and stranded on the rocks of Bermuda. The passengers of the Sea Venture constructed two new vessels, and reached Virginia May 24, 1610. Having in the meantime been sent to England with a report of the condition of the colony, he returned to Virginia in Aug., 1611, with 300 new emigrants. In the same year he assumed the office of governor, a position which he held until 1614, when he returned to England.

Gath (gath). [Heb., 'wine-press.'] One of the five confederate cities of the Philistines, the birthplace of the giant Goliath. It was conquered by David, turned by Rehoboam into a fortress, taken by Hazael, king of Damascus, and destroyed by Uzziah, and then vanishes from history. Its position is uncertain, but it is possibly the modern Tell es Safi.

Gatha (Skt. gāt'hā; Avestan gā'thą). [' Song.'] In Sanskrit, a religious verse, but one not taken from the Vedas. Such verses are interspersed in the Sanskrit Buddhist work called "Lalitavistara," composed in a dialect between the Sanskrit and Prakrit, and have given their name to this the Gatha dialect. The oldest portion of the Avesta consists of Gathas or hymns believed to go back, at least in part, to Zarathushtra himself.

Gâtinais (gä-tē-nā'), or Gâtinois (gä-tē-nwä'). An ancient territory of France. Capital, Nemours. It lay south of Paris, partly in Ile-de-France, partly in Orleanais, and is comprised in the departments Loiret, Nièvre, Yonne, and Seine-et-Marne. It was united to the French crown under Philip I. in 1068.

Gaul (gal). [F. Gaule, Sp. Galia, Pg. It. Gallia, G. Gallien, from L. Gallia, from Gallus, a Gaul]. 1. In ancient geography, the country of the Gauls; in an inexact use, France. It was divided into Cisalpine Gaul and Transalpine Gaul, and is often taken as equivalent to Transalpine Gaul.

> Neither . . . is France even yet coextensive with Gaul. If Britain includes Scotland as well as England, Gaul includes Belgium and Switzerland as well as France.
> Freeman, Hist. Essays, I. 165.

> The name "Gaul" has never fully died out as the designation of France. How does the case stand in what was so long the common language of Europe? The most pedantic Ciceronian never scrupled to talk familiarly about Anglus and Anglia; but Francus and Francia are hardly known except in language more or less formal. Gallia, Gallus, Gallicanus Rex, are constantly used by writers who would never think of an analogous use of Britannus and Britannia. In ecclesiastical matters Gaul has always remained, even in formal designation, The Gallican Church answers to the Anglican, the Primate of the Gauls to the Primate of All England. Freeman, Hist. Essays, I. 165.

2. One of the four prefectures of the later Roman Empire. It comprised the dioceses of Spain, Gaul, and Britain, and corresponded to Spain, Portugal, a small strip of Morocco, France, Belgium, Switzerland, Holland and Germany to the Rhine, England, Wales, and the south of Scotland.

3. A diocese of the later Roman prefecture of Gaul. It was included between the Atlantic, the English Channel, the North Sea, the Rhine, the Alps, the Mediterranean, and the Pyrenees.

4. An old name of Wales, as in "Amadis de Gaul."

> This general opinion, that Wales was the country of Amadis, was not an unnatural one, since Gaules and Gaul, in old English, was the name for Wales as well as France: — "Iesu Gallia and Gaul — French and Welsh — soul-curer and body-curer," exclaims the host in the "Merry Wives of Windsor" (act iii. scene 1), while addressing the French doctor and the Welsh parson.
> Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 355.

Gaul, Cisalpine. [L. Gallia Cisalpina (or Citerior).] In ancient history, that part of Gaul lying on this side the Alps (that is, from Rome, on the southern side of the Alps). It extended from the Alps southward and eastward. Its conquest was founded at Sena Gallica 283 B. C. Part of the country was reduced between the first and second Punic wars. Milan and Como being captured, and the conquest was completed 201–191 B. C. It was made a Roman province, and was incorporated with Italy 43 B. C.

Gaul, Cispadane. [L. Gallia Cispadana.] In ancient geography, the part of Cisalpine Gaul this side (south of) the Po.

Gaul, Transalpine. [L. Gallia Transalpinæ.] In ancient geography, that part of Gaul which lay beyond the Alps (that is, north and northwest of the Alps from Rome). It comprised in the Roman period Narbonensis, Aquitania, Lugdunensis, and Belgica. Its ancient inhabitants were Gauls, Iberians, and Germans. Many remains of older inhabitants have been discovered, especially in the center of Gaul (Auvergne, etc.). The Gallic antiquities are especially numerous in the neighborhood of Nemausus. Greek colonies were planted in early times in the south (see Marseilles). The Roman settlements were made first in the southeast in the end of the second century B. C. (see Provincia and Narbonensis). Gaul was thoroughly conquered by Julius Cæsar 58–51 B. C. Augustus divided it into four provinces. Other divisions were introduced in the 2d century. A division of the diocese of Gaul into 17 provinces was made in the 4th century. It was invaded by the Suevi, Alans, Vandals, West Goths, Burgundians, and Franks in the 5th century. See Gallia Transalpina.

> Transalpine Gaul, as a geographical division, has wellmarked boundaries in the Mediterranean, the Alps, the Rhine, the Ocean, and the Pyrenees. But this geographical division has never answered to any political unity. Gaul was not Cæsar's day, that is, Gaul beyond the Roman province, formed three divisions. Aquitaine to the south-west, Celtic Gaul in the middle, and Belgic Gaul to the north-east. Strabo, according to the Geographe — the name was under Augustus extended to the Saône — has Iberian, akin to the people on the other side of the Pyrenees; a traced of its old speech remains in the small Basque district north of the Pyrenees. Celtic Gaul, from the Loire to the Seine and Marne, was the most truly Celtic land, and it was in this part of Gaul that the modern Celtic tongues originated in the 2d century. The third division, Belgic Gaul, the tribes to the east, nearer to the Rhine, were some of them purely German, and others had been to a great extent brought under German influences or mixed with German elements. There was, in fact, no unity in Gaul beyond that which the Romans brought with them. Freeman, Hist. Geogr., p. 57.

Gaul, Transpadane. [L. Gallia Transpadana.] In ancient geography, the part of Cisalpine Gaul beyond (north of) the Po.

Gaulley (gâ'li) Mountains. A range in West Virginia, regarded as continuous with the Cumberland Mountains.

Gauls (gâlz). [L. Galli.] The leading division of the Celtic race. In historical times they occupied Transalpine and Cisalpine Gaul. Galatia was settled by them in the 3d century B. C.

Gaunt (gânt or gant), John of. See John of Gaunt.

Gauntlet (gânt'let or gânt'let). Emilia. The virtuous heroine of Smollett's "Peregrine Pickle." Peregrine falls in love with her.

Gauntlett (gânt'let), Henry John. Born at Clayton, Sussex, in 1805; died Feb. 21, 1876. A noted English organist, composer, and musical editor. For more than forty years he composed and edited psalm and hymn tunes, besides writing criticisms and reviews for musical periodicals.

Gaur, or Gaurpara (gour). A ruined city in Bengal, India, near the Ganges south of Malda. From the 18th century it was the usual capital of the Mohammedan viceroys of Bengal and kings of Bengal. It fell into ruins from about 1575.

Gaur (in Afghanistan). See Ghur.

Gaurisankar. Mount Everest.

Gaurus (gâ'rus), modern Monte Barbaro (mon'te bär'bä-rō). In ancient geography, a mountain in Italy, 7 miles west of Naples. Here, 342 (343? or 340?) B. C., the Romans under Valerius Corvus defeated the Samnites.

Gauss (gous), Karl Friedrich. Born at Brunswick, Germany, April 30, 1777; died at Göttingen, Prussia, Feb. 23, 1855. A celebrated German mathematician, appointed professor of mathematics at Göttingen in 1807. His works include "Disquisitiones arithmeticæ" (1801), "Theoria motus corporum cœlestium" (1809), "Atlas des Erdmagnetismus" (1840), "Dioptrische Untersuchungen" (1843), etc.

Gausta (gous'tâ). The highest mountain in southern Norway, about lat. 59° 50′ N. Height, 6,180 feet.

Gautama (gou'ta-mạ). [Skt.] The family name of Buddha. (See Buddha.) The Pali form is Gotama.

Gauti (gä'ti). [L. Aborbaemus Gautiphalk. Gr. (Ptolemy) Γαυτοι, AS. Geatas, ON. Gautar.] A Germanic tribe in the southern part of the Scandinavian peninsula, nearly coincident with the present Swedish province Gothland (Swedish Götaland), where they are mentioned by Ptolemy. They are the Geatas of the Anglo-Saxon Beowulf, and are not to be confounded with the Goths. They ultimately formed a constituent part of the Swedes.

Gautier (gō-tyā'). Marguerite. The principal character in Dumas's "La dame aux camélias."

Gautier, Théophile. Born at Tarbes, Aug. 31, 1811; died at Paris, Oct. 23, 1872. A French poet, critic, and novelist. He graduated from the Lycée Charlemagne in Paris, studied painting for a while, and then entered into the romantic movement in French literature. His first book, "Poésies" (1830), was followed by "Albertus" (1832), "La Dame Française" (1832), "Mademoiselle de Maupin" (1835), "Les Jeunes-France" (1833), "Nouvelles" (1845), "Le Roman de la momie" (1856), "Le Capitaine Fracasse" (1863), and other novels. His best-known poems are his papers on Dramatic and Charles Baudelaire. In 1858 he went over to the staff of "Le Moniteur Universel," later "Journal Officiel," and was identified with that sheet until his death. As a result of his travels in Spain (1840), Belgium and Holland, Algeria (1845), Italy (1850), Constantinople and Athens (1852), and Russia (1858), he wrote his "Voyages en Espagne" (1843), "Zigzags" (1845), "Italia" (1852), "Constantinople" (1853), "Tableaux à vol d'oiseau" (1852), "Les Beaux-arts en Europe" (1855), "Loin de Paris" (1864), "Quand on voyage" (1865), and "Voyage en Russie" (1866). He found also in foreign countries materials for his stories of "Militona" (1847), "La Marcella" (1852), and "Le Roman de la momie" (1856). He wrote "Fortunio" for "La Presse" (1837), and "La Capitaine Fracasse" for "La Presse" (1861–62), and "Le Journal" (1863). Other stories of his are "La toison d'or," "Omphale," "Le petit chien de la marquise," "Le nid de rossignols" (1833), "La morte amoureuse" (1836), "La chaine d'or," "Le roi Candaule" (1845), "Jean et Jeannette" (1846), "Les toiles innocentes," "Le roi Candaule" (1847), "La belle Jenny," "La peau de tigre" (1864–1865), "Spirite" (1865), "La Juive de Constantine" (1869), "Partie carrée," "Mademoiselle Dafne," "Tableaux de siège," etc. For the stage Gautier wrote "Le Tricorne enchanté," "Pierrot posthume" (1842), "La Juive de Constantine" (1846), "Regardez mais n'y touchez pas" (1847), "L'Amour souffle où il veut," etc. His works of pure fantasy are "Une larme du diable" (1839), and themes of old legends, as "Giselle" (1841), "Esparo" (1843), "Gemma" (1850), and "Jettatura" (1858). Gautier's poems from 1833 to 1858 were gathered under the title "La comédie de la mort." His later poetical compositions appeared as "Émaux et camées" (1856). Besides collaborating on "L'histoire des peintres" (1847), Gautier wrote independently "Le salon de peinture de 1847," "L'Art moderne" (1856), "Les Beaux-arts en Europe" (1852), and "Histoire de l'art dramatique en France depuis vingt-cinq ans" (1859). Scattered sketches by Gautier have appeared, since their author's death, under the collective titles "Poésies et caux-fortes," "Tableaux à la plume," and "Portraits contemporains."

Gavarni (gä-vär-nē'), pseudonym of Sulpice Paul Chevalier. Born at Paris, Jan. 13, 1801; died at Auteuil, Paris, Nov. 23, 1866. A French caricaturist, noted for delineations of Parisian life, etc.; artist name of the Chavivari.

Gavarnie, Cirque de. A natural amphitheater in the Pyrenees, 14 miles south-southeast of Cauterets. Width, 2¼ miles. Height, 5,380 feet.

Gaveston (gav'es-ton; F. pron. gā-ves-tōn'), Piers. Executed June 19, 1312. The favorite of Edward II. of England. He was the son of a Gascon knight in the service of Edward I., and was brought up in the royal household as the foster-brother and playmate of Prince Edward, over whom he acquired a complete ascendancy. He incurred the enmity of the barons by his arrogance and ostentation, and was banished by Edward I. in 1307, but was recalled on the accession of Edward II. in the same year. He was created earl of Cornwall in 1307, and in 1308 acted as regent of the kingdom during the king's absence in France. His conduct, however, so irritated the barons that, in spite of the protection of Edward, he was again banished, and exiled in 1308 and 1311–12. His recall in 1312 provoked a rising of the barons, in the course of which he was captured and executed.

Gavroche (gäv-rosh'). In Victor Hugo's "Les Misérables," a street Arab. He has become a type.

Gawain, or Gawayne (gä'wān), Sir. One of the principal knights of the Round Table, in the Arthurian cycle of romance. He appears first in Geoffrey of Monmouth as Walwain (Galliced to Gawayn) and thenceforward overtopped the romances. He is known as "the courteous." Chrestien of Troyes gives him the first place among the knights. The poem "Sir Gawayne and the Grene Knight," from the French metrical romance of Perceval, is assigned to about the year

Gawain, Sir

1400; it has been republished by the Early English Text Society. There was another knight of this name who served under Amadis of Gaul and achieved great deeds.

Gay (gā), Claude. Born at Draguignan, March 18, 1800; died at Paris, April 6, 1873. A French naturalist. From 1820 to 1842 he was employed by the Chilean government in a detailed topographical and scientific survey of that country. Besides studying and collecting plants, animals, and minerals, he amassed much historical material. The results were published in the "Historia física y política de Chile" (Paris and Santiago, 24 vols. and 2 of atlas, 1845–54), and in a large map of Chile. Gay returned to Paris in 1842. He subsequently traveled in Russia and Tabriz, and studied the mines of the United States.

Gay Saber (gī or ga sä-bär'). [Pr., 'Gay Science.'] A gild formed by the magistrates of Toulouse in 1323, with the purpose of restoring the Provençal language and culture, which had nearly died out. It was called originally "Sobregaya Companhon" or "Sobregaya companhia" (the very gay company of the seven troubadours of Toulouse). The first meeting was held May 1, 1324.

The concourse was great, and the first prize was given to a poem by Arnaut de Vidalona, by Ramon Vidal de Besalù, a Catalan gentleman, who seems to have been the author of the regulations for the festival, and to have been elected a doctor of the Gay Science on the occasion. In 1355 this company formed for itself a more ample body of laws, partly in prose and partly in verse, under the title of "Ordenangas dels Sept Senhors Mantenedors del Gay Saber," and was known as the Consistory or Consistoire of the Gay Saber, which, with the needful modifications, have been observed down to our own times and still regulate the festival annually celebrated at Toulouse on the first day of May, under the name of the Floral Games.

Gebal (gē'bal). A maritime city of Phenicia, situated on a hill close to the Mediterranean, north of Beirut: the ancient Byblus and Arabic Jebel. It was one of the earliest of the Phenician settlements, and second only in importance to Tyre and Sidon. Its inhabitants, the Gebalites, are mentioned as skilful in hewing stone (1 K. v. 18) and in shipbuilding (Ezek. xxvii. 9). It was the birthplace of Philo, the translator of Sanchuniathon; but it was most celebrated as the oldest seat of the cult of Adonis, to whom it was sacred, and after whom the river it stands on was named. Gebal is mentioned as a kingdom paying tribute to Assyria in the annals of Tiglath-Pileser II. and Esarhaddon. It was taken by Alexander the Great. Later it became a Christian see. The modern Jebel has only a few hundred inhabitants. Thin inscriptions carried on there by Renan unearthed numerous tombs and sarcophagi and the substructions of a large temple, perhaps that of Adonis.

The arbitrary and oppressive financial policy which he adopted toward the American colonies after the return of peace caused the outbreak of the American Revolution in 1775. The war, which ensued, was practically ended by the capitulation of Cornwallis Oct. 19, 1781; and the independence of the colonies was acknowledged by the treaty of Paris Sept. 3, 1783. The legislative union of Great Britain and Ireland was effected Jan. 1, 1801. In 1756 war broke out between England and the revolutionary government in France, which, with a short interruption in 1802–03, was continued until the downfall of Napoleon and the restoration of the Bourbons. During 1812–14 a war was also carried on against the United States. After several temporary attacks of mental derangement, the king became hopelessly insane in 1811, and during the rest of his reign the government was conducted under the regency of the Prince of Wales (afterward George IV.).

George IV. Born at London, Aug. 12, 1762; died at Windsor, June 25, 1830. King of Great Britain and Ireland 1820–30, son of George III. and Charlotte Sophia of Mecklenburg-Strelitz. He contracted an illegal marriage with Mrs. Fitzherbert, Dec. 15, 1785; April 8, 1795, married his cousin Caroline Amelia Elizabeth of Brunswick. While prince of Wales he cultivated the friendship of the opposition leaders, including Fox, Sheridan, and, under the influence of Mrs. Fitzherbert, associated with the most dissolute habits. He was appointed regent when his father became insane in 1811, and succeeded him on the latter's death. He ascended the throne of Hanover, Jan. 24, 1820. On his appointment to the regency he abandoned his former Whig associates and allied himself with the Tories. He intrusted to a commission the divorce proceedings against Queen Caroline, and, June 6, 1820, instituted proceedings in the House of Lords for a divorce on the ground of infidelity. The proceedings were subsequently abandoned for want of evidence. The chief event of his reign was the passage of the Catholic Emancipation Act during the ministry of the Duke of Wellington, April 13, 1829.

George V. Born at Berlin, May 27, 1819; died at Paris, June 12, 1878. King of Hanover, son of Ernest Augustus whom he succeeded in 1851. He sided with Austria in 1866, with the result that his dominions were annexed by Prussia in the same year.

George (Christian Wilhelm Ferdinand Adolphus). Born at Copenhagen, Dec. 24, 1845. King of the Hellenes, the second son of Christian IX. of Denmark. He was elected king of the Hellenes by the Greek National Assembly, March 30, 1863, at the instance of the great powers, which, in order to secure the separation of Greece from Turkey, were anxious to restore the Ionian Islands to Greece. The principal event of his reign has been the incorporation in 1881, through the latter's ventures of the greater part of Thessaly and a small part of Epirus with Greece. He married the grand duchess Olga, daughter of the grand duke Constantine, Oct. 27, 1867.

George, surnamed "The Bearded." Born Aug. 27, 1471; died April 17, 1539. Duke of Saxony, son of Albert the Brave whom he succeeded in 1500. He was educated for the priesthood, and is chiefly noted for his opposition to the Reformation, which was forced on his uncle, the Elector of Saxony. He attended the disputation between Eck and Luther at Leipsic, July 4–14, 1519, and subsequently himself engaged in debate with Luther. He sought in vain to prevent, by imprisonment and execution, the spread in his dominions of the principles of the Reformation, which were adopted by his brother Henry who succeeded him in the duchy.

George, Prince of Denmark. Born April 23 (21?), 1653; died Oct. 28, 1708. Husband of Queen Anne of England, whom he married July 28, 1683. He was the second son of Frederick III. of Denmark and Sophia Amalia, daughter of the Duke of Brunswick-Lüneburg, grandfather of George I. of England.

George of Cyprus. Died 1290. A learned Byzantine writer. Though a layman, he was elevated to the patriarchate of Constantinople in 1283; he resigned in 1289, adopted the monastic life, and died in that station. He is the author of a number of works, mostly theological, including an autobiography in Greek which was published at Venice in 1553. See J. Bernard de Rubeis under the title "Vita Georgii Cypri."

George of Laodicea. A Semi-Arian bishop of Laodicea. Concerning his age little is known, except that he was an occupant of the episcopal chair in 330, and that he was still in occupant of it in 363. He headed the Semi-Arian party at the Council of Seleucia in Isauria in 359.

George the Pisidian, L. Georgius Pisides (jē-or'ji-us pis'i-dēz) or Pisida (pis'i-da). A Byzantine poet who lived about the middle of the 7th century. He is described in the manuscripts of his writings as a deacon, record-keeper, and keeper of the sacred vessels in Hagia Sophia at Constantinople, and, though not appears to have accompanied the emperor Heraclius on his first expedition against the Persians (622). Among his extant works are an epic poem treating of the expedition.

George of Trebizond. Born in Crete, April 4, 1396; died at Rome about 1486. A celebrated humanist. He became professor of Greek at Venice about 1428, and subsequently removed to Rome, where about 1450 he became papal secretary. He was an ardent advocate of the Aristotelian system of philosophy, in opposition to his contemporary, the Platonic philosopher Gemistus Pletho. He translated many of the Greek classics into Latin, and wrote "Rhetorica" (1470), "Comparationes Philosophorum Platonis et Aristotelis" (1523), etc.

George, Henry. Born at Philadelphia, Sept. 2, 1839. An American writer on political economy and sociology. He went to sea at an early age, and in 1858 settled in California, where he became a journalist. In 1871 he published his chief work, "Progress and Poverty." He removed in 1880 to New York, where he was an unsuccessful candidate of the United Labor Party for the mayoralty in 1886, and where he shortly afterward founded a weekly paper called the "Standard." Besides "Progress and Poverty," he has published "The Land Question" (1881), "Social Problems" (1884), "Protection or Free Trade" (1886), and other works.

George, Lake. [Named from George II. in 1755 by William Johnson.] A lake in the eastern part of New York. Its waters are carried by Ticonderoga creek into Lake Champlain. It is inclosed by mountains, and is noted for its picturesque scenery. It was the scene of military operations in the French and Indian and Revolutionary wars. A series of engagements was fought here Sept. 8, 1755: in the morning the French force under Dieskau defeated the English under Williams, etc.; and in the afternoon the English under Lyman (nominally under Johnson) defeated Dieskau at the head of the lake. The Indians were allies of the French St. Sacrement. Length, 36 miles. Width, 1 to 4 miles.

George-a-Greene, the Pinner of Wakefield. A "pleasant conceyted comedie" by Robert Greene, licensed 1595, printed 1599. It is thought to be founded on an early prose romance, "The History of George-a-Green," preserved in Thoms's "Early Prose Romances." It also owes something to the ballad "The Jolly Pinder of Wakefield with Robin Hood, Scarlet and John." George a Green, a "Huisher of the Bower," is introduced by Jonson in "The Sad Shepherd."

Georgia (jōr'jiā). [Russ. Gruzia, Pers. and Turk. Gurjistan.] A designation (non-official) of a region in Transcaucasian Russia, nearly corresponding to the modern governments Yelisabetpol, Kutais, and Tiflis. It is almost identical with the ancient Iberia. Georgia was conquered by Alexander the Great, but soon after his death became an independent kingdom. It was at its height about 1200, and had a flourishing literature. It was subdivided in the beginning of the 19th century, and was annexed by Russia in 1801. The Georgians are a very handsome race, of the purest Caucasian type.

Georgia, [Named from George II. of England.] One of the Southern States of the United States of America. Capital, Atlanta. It is bounded by Tennessee and North Carolina on the north, South Carolina (from which it is separated by the Savannah River) and the Atlantic Ocean on the east, Florida on the south, and Alabama (from which it is separated in part by the Chattahoochee River) on the west. The surface is level in the south, undulating in the center, and mountainous in the north. It is one of the chief cotton-producing States. Other leading products are lumber, rice, etc. The chief minerals are gold, iron, and coal. The recent development of its manufactures, particularly of cotton, woolens, and iron, is notable. There are 137 counties. It sends 2 senators and 11 representatives to Congress, and has 13 electoral votes. Georgia was settled by a chartered company of English colonists under Oglethorpe in 1733; became a royal province in 1752; was one of the thirteen original States (1776); seceded Jan. 19, 1861; and was readmitted June, 1868. Georgics (jōr'jiks). [L. Georgica carmina, agricultural poems.] A poem by Vergil, in four books, treating of agriculture, the cultivation of trees, domestic animals, and bees.

The subject is treated with evident love and the enthusiasm which belongs to thorough knowledge, and glorified and idealized as much as the character permits. So that even the didactic parts are not essentially different in tone from those which are purely poetical. The poem has thus been rendered the most perfect of the larger productions of Roman art-poetry.

Gepidæ (jep'i-dē), or Gepids (jep'idz). [L. (Vopiscus) Gepidæ. Gr. (Procopius) Uzoudes.] A Germanic tribe, a branch of the Goths, who first appear in history in the reign of Probus, in the 3d century. Their original home was apparently on the Baltic, on the mouth of the Vistula, whence they joined the general Gothic movement southward. Later they had conquered Dacia, where they were however practically annihilated shortly after the middle of the 6th century by the allied Lombards and Avars.

Probably the Thervings and Greutungs were the only peoples to whom the name of Goths in strictness belonged. There was, however, a third tribe, the Gepids, whom the other two recognized as being, if not exactly Goths, at any rate their nearest kinsfolk, and as having originally formed one nation with them.

Bradley, Story of the Goths, p. 7.

Gera (gā'rā). The capital of Reuss (younger line), Germany, on the White Elster 34 miles south-southwest of Leipsic, noted for varied manufactures. Population (1890), 39,599.

Gerasa (jer'a-sā), modern Jerash (je-räsh'). In ancient geography, a city of the Decapolis, Palestina Tertia, northeast of Jericho. It contains many antiquities. The forum, which is oval and 300 feet long, is surrounded by a range of Ionic columns, many of which still stand with their entablature. From it extended a colonnaded street, intersecting the entire city, and crossed at right angles by another. Over 100 columns still stand along the street. They seem to have formed a series of porticos with galleries above. Among the remains are those of a great temple, the cella of which (66 by 78 feet) is in great part standing together with many columns of the peristyle. A theater has 28 tiers of seats still remaining above ground, with one precinction, to which vaulted passages give access. In the back wall of the precinction there are small chambers, perhaps boxes. A gallery surrounds the top of the cavea. A smaller theater on the same site is equally perfect and interesting.

An English soldier, third son of the first Duke of Dorset, created Viscount Sackville in 1782. He served (as colonel) in Flanders 1743–45; was first to charge the lord lieutenant of Ireland 1751–65; was appointed major-general in 1755, and lieutenant-general in 1757; joined in the descent on the French coast in 1758; served as second in command under Marlborough in Hanover in the same year; and succeeded to the chief command on Marlborough's death. He fell into disgrace on account of his conduct at the battle of Minden (Aug. 1, 1759), and was dismissed from the army.

German Confederation, G. Deutscher Bund (doit'sher bönt). The confederation of German states constituted by the Congress of Vienna in 1815, replacing the ancient empire, each state remaining independent in internal affairs. Austria (which entered the confederation for German dominions), Upper and Lower Austria, Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, Salzburg, Tyrol, Vorarlberg, Styria, Carinthia and Carniola, Goiz, and Trieste) had the lead. Other members were: Prussia, Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Saxony, Hanover, Baden, Hesse-Cassel, Saxe-Weimar, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Mecklenburg-Strelitz, Oldenburg, Brunswick, Nassau, Saxe-Gotha-Altenburg, Saxe-Meiningen, Saxe-Hildburghausen, Saxe-Coburg-Saalfeld, Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, the Hohenzollerns, Liechtenstein, Anhalt-Dessau, Anhalt-Kothen, Waldeck, Reuss (elder line), Reuss (younger line), Lippe, Schaumburg-Lippe, Hesse-Homburg, Lübeck, Frankfort, Bremen, and Hamburg. Several minor changes took place in the composition of the confederation. The Diet met at Frankfort-on-the-Main. The King of the Netherlands entered the confederation for Luxemburg, and the King of Denmark for Holstein and Lauenburg. The Prussian provinces of East and West Prussia and Posen were not included. The confederation was dissolved as one result of the war of 1866, and was replaced by the North German Confederation.

Germans (jėr'manz). [L. Germani.] An important Teutonic race inhabiting central Europe, or the inhabitants of Germany. At the beginning of the Christian era the Germans occupied central Europe eastward to the Vistula, southward to the Carpathians and Danube, and westward to the Rhine. Among their chief tribes were the Suevi, Lombards, Vandals, Heruli, Chatti, Quadi, Ubii, and Cherusci. After the epoch of migrations in the 3d and 4th centuries, many tribes, as the Franks, Burgundians, Lombards, and Vandals settled permanently in other regions, and became merged in the new French, Italian, and Spanish nations. In the east the Germans were displaced by Slavs, although important parts of this region have since been Germanized. Since about the 12th century the Germans have called themselves Deutsche (which see). In modern times they have occupied a region which has had many political changes, but which has remained substantially the same extent for certain limits. The former Roman German Empire contained various lands not inhabited by Germans. At the present time the Germans form the great majority in the reconstituted German Empire; they number over one fourth of the inhabitants of Austria-Hungary chiefly in the west-in and northwestern parts; there are about 1,000,000 Germans in the Baltic provinces and elsewhere in Russia; and about two thirds of the Swiss are of German race and language.

German Southwest Africa. A German dependency situated between the Orange and Kunene rivers, and between the Atlantic and long. 20° E. It covers 322,000 square miles, has only about 190,000 inhabitants, of whom only 4,682 are white. North of the Swakop River the country is called Hereroland or Damaraland, south of it Great Namaland or Namaqualand. The soil is good, yielding excellent pasturage. In the Kunene valley orange, date, dom, and fan palm, and valuable for agriculture is found. The slopes of discovering rich mines have not yet been realized. The best harbor of the coast, Walfisch Bay, is British. Five German companies are still at work here: the Colonization Society; the Settlement Company, which is trying to settle German and South African colonists; a private cattle-raising company, with imperial subsidy; and the West African Company and Southwest African Company, which are largely or wholly English. The whole coast has been surveyed by F. A. S. Ludwitz, of some land around Angra Pequena. Over the Germany hoisted her flag in 1884, claiming at the same time all the coast between the Orange River and Cape Frio. Hereroland was annexed by treaty in 1885, was lost in 1888, and was regained by force in 1890. Portugal in 1886 and England in 1890 recognized the present boundaries. Henrik Witboy, a civilized chief of the Nama Hottentots who had never submitted to the German authorities, was defeated in 1893.

Germantown (jėr'man-toun). A former borough of Pennsylvania, since 1854 a part of Philadelphia, situated 6 miles north-northwest of the old state-house. Here, Oct. 4, 1777, the Americans under Washington were repulsed by the British, the loss of the Americans being about 1,000 that of the British over 500.

Germanus (jėr-mā'nus), Saint, F. St. Germain l'Auxerrois. Born at Auxerre about 378: died at Ravenna, Italy, about 448. A French prelate, bishop of Auxerre.

Germanus, Saint, of Paris. Born at Autun, France, about 496: died about 576. A French prelate, bishop of Paris. The Church of St. Germain-des-Près (Paris) was named from him.

Germany (jėr'ma-ni). [ME. Germanie, OF. Germanie, Sp. Germania, Pg. It. Germania, from L.

Germanicia, Gr. Ermineia, from L. Germani, Gr. Ermineis, Germans. Another name appears in the obs. E. Almaine, Almayne, from F. Allemagne, Sp. Alemania, Pg. Alemanha, It. Alemagna. Mlt. Alemannia, Alemannorum from Alemanni, Alemanes, the Alamanni (which see).

A third name is the obs. E. Dutchland, ME. Duchelond, D. Duitschland, G. Deutschland.] A country of central Europe. The country has been of widely different extent, and the name of different significance, at different times. The present Germany, or the German Empire (G. Das Deutsches Reich), one of the great European powers, is bounded by the North Sea, Denmark, and the Baltic sea on the north, Russia and Austro-Hungary on the east, Austria-Hungary (partly separated by the Sudetic Mountains, Riesengebirge, Erzgebirge, and Alps) and Switzerland (united mainly by the Rhine and Lake of Constance) on the south, and France (partly separated by the Vosges) and Belgium (separated by the Meuse) and Luxemburg on the west. Extreme length, north and south, 540 miles; breadth, 530 to 622 miles. The northern part belongs to the great northern plain; the middle and southern parts are generally hilly and mountainous. The chief mountains are the Alps, Black Forest, Vosges, Swabian and Franconian Jura, Fichtelgebirge, Erzgebirge, Taunus, Thuringerwald, Harz, mountains of Westphalia and the Rhine, Riesengebirge, and Rhine wald. The chief rivers are the Rhine (with the Moselle, Neckar, and Main), Ems, Weser, Elbe, Oder, Vistula, and Danube. The products are corn, potatoes, beet, hemp, flax, and wine. There are mines of iron, coal, salt, copper, zinc, lead, silver, etc., and important manufactures of cotton and woolen goods, iron, steel, sugar, etc. Germany contains 25 states: Prussia, Bavaria, Wurtemberg, Baden, Saxony, Hesse, Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Mecklenburg-Strelitz, Oldenburg, Brunswick, Saxe-Weimar-Eisenach, Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, Saxe-Meiningen, Saxe-Altenburg, Waldeck, Lippe, Schaumburg-Lippe, Reuss (elder line), Reuss (younger line), Anhalt, Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, Schwarzburg-Rudolstadt, Hamburg, Bremen, Lubeck, and the Reichsland Alsace-Lorraine. The government is a constitutional monarchy. The King of Prussia is hereditary German emperor; the legislature consists of a Bundesrat of 58 members and a Reichstag of 397 members. The language of the great majority is German; other languages are Poles, Lithuanians, Wends, Czechs, Danes, French, and Walloons. The religion of a large majority is Protestant; about 35 per cent are Catholic. The colonies of the German states are Deutsch-Neuguinea, Kamerun, German Southwest Africa (protectorate), German East Africa (protectorate), Kaiser Wilhelm's Land (a protectorate in Papua), Bismarck Archipelago (protectorate), Solomon Islands, and Marshall Islands. The present empire replaced the North German Confederation, and released in fractions between that body and the different South German states. William I, king of Prussia, was proclaimed emperor at Versailles, Jan. 18, 1871. The empire was one result of the successful war with France, 1870-71. Other events have been the "Kulturkampf," the rise of the Social Democrats, the union of the three emperors (of Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Russia), replaced by the Triple Alliance (Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Italy), the acquisition since 1884 of foreign dependencies and "spheres of influence," and the retirement of Bismarck in 1890. (See Germania, Holy Roman Empire, and German Confederation; also Prussia, Bavaria, and the different states.) Area, 208,738 square miles. Population (1890), 49,428,470.

He [Tacitus] includes in Germany all the countries lying north of the Danube and west of the Vistula, since the Vistula so far as the Arctic Regions: taking in Bohemia, Silesia, Poland, Pomerania, and a vast number of Slavonian districts besides, which are now about twice as large as that which is now allowed to the Territory of Germany.

Germersheim (ger'mers-hīm). A fortified town in the Palatinate, Bavaria, situated at the junction of the Queich with the Rhine, 8 miles southwest of Spires. It is an important strategic point, and was the scene of a defeat of the French under Beaulieu by the Austrians under Wurmser, July 19 and 22, 1793. Population (1890), 6,008.

Germinal (zhėr-me-nāl'). [F., "the germinating."] The name adopted in 1793 by the National Convention of the first French republic for the seventh month of the year. It consisted of 30 days, beginning in the years 1 to 7 with March 21, and in the years 8 to 13 with March 22.

Germinal Insurrection. The insurrection ("bread riots") at Paris against the Convention, 1794 (Germinal, year III (April 1, 1795).

Gero (ger'ō), Died May 20, 965. A German duke. He was made margrave of the ostmark in 939, and compelled the Slavic tribes between the Elbe and the Oder to acknowledge his suzerainty. He is referred to in the "Nibelungenlied."

Gérôme (zhā-rōm'), Jean Léon. Born at Vesoul, Haute-Saône, May 11, 1824. A celebrated French painter, a pupil of Paul Delaroche. He studied in Italy 1844–45, and later traveled in Turkey, Egypt, and elsewhere. He became professor of painting at the School of Fine Arts in 1863. His first appearance at the Salon was in 1847. His works include "Mahomet and St. John" (1848), "Anacreon with Bacchus and Cupid" (1848), "Bacchus and Cupid Intoxicated" (1850), "Greek Interior," "Souvenir of Italy" (1851), "Vica of Pecrum" (1852), "An Idyl" (1855), "Russian Concert," "Age of Augustus" (1855), "Egyptian Recruits crossing the Desert," "Memnon and Sesostris," "Canaris at a Watering-place" (1857), "Ghaldiabes selling Circassian Beauties" (1859), "Phryne before the Tribunal," "Alcibiades in the House of Aspasia," "Rembrandt Etching" (1861), "Prisoner" (1863), "Reception of Siamese Ambassadors at Fontainebleau," "Prayer" (1865), "The patrician's Levee," "Door of Mosque of El-Hacamyn" (1869), "Slave Market," "Clothing Merchant," "Death of Cæsar" (1867), "Seventh of December, 1857" (1868), "Gladiators," "Cairo Peddler," "Promenade of the Harem" (1869), "Rex Tibicen," "Santon at the Door of a Mosque," "Women at the Bath," "Bashi-Bazouks Dancing," "Return from the Chase" (1878), "Slave Market in Rome," "Night in the Desert," "Danse du ventre" (1880), "Great Bath at Brusa" (1885), etc. *C. Gerona (ha-rō'na). 1. A province in Catalonia, Spain, bounded by France on the north, the Mediterranean on the east, and Barcelona and Lerida on the south and west. Area, 2,272 square miles. Population (1887), 305,539.—2. The capital of the province of Gerona, situated on the Ter 55 miles northeast of Barcelona. It was a place of importance from the 14th and following centuries. The road is remarkable in that it covers in a single span, with a vault of 75 feet, the entire width of nave and aisles of the sanctuary. There is a 11th century cloister, with beautiful capitals. The town is noted for its sieges, especially those of 1808 and 1809 by the French. Population (1887), 14,575.

Geronimo (je-ron'i-mo). A North American Indian, chief of the Chiricahua band of the Apache tribe. He commanded a party of hostiles who were pursued first by General George Crook and afterward by General Nelson A. Miles in 1886. He was captured in the summer of 1886, and was held as a prisoner of war.

Géronte (zha-rōnt'). In French comedy, a common name for a credulous and ridiculous old man. Originally, as in Corneille's "Le menteur," he was old and not ridiculous, but the Gérontes in Molière's "Le bourgeois gentilhomme" and "Les fourberies de Scapin" came a type. Regnard introduces a Géronte in "Le joueur," "Le retour imprevu," and "Le legataire universel."

Gerontius (je-ron'shi-us). A British general in the army of the usurper Constantine. He rebelled against his master in 408, and proclaimed one Maximus emperor. He then invaded Spain, and besieged Constantine in Arles, and, when Constans was captured by the insurgents at Vienne, ordered him to be put to death. He was eventually abandoned by his troops, and, being surrounded by Honorius' forces, killed himself in 411.

Gerrard (je-rärd'). 1. The real name of the King of the Beggars in Beaumont and Fletcher's "Beggar's Bush." He goes under the name of Clause.—2. The "gentleman dancing-master" in Wycherley's comedy of that name. He is a performed coxcomb who, to conduct an intrigue with Hippolita, under the mask of her father and duenna, is induced to assume the role of a dancing-master.

Gerrha (ger'ä). In ancient geography, a city of Arabia Felix, situated on the Persian Gulf. It was inhabited by the Chaldæans and Assyrians b. c., under the Assyrians, Babylonians, and Persians.

Gerry (ger'i). Elbridge. Born at Marblehead, Mass., July 17, 1744; died at Washington, D. C., Nov. 23, 1814. An American statesman. He was a delegate to the Continental Congress 1776–80 and 1782–85; a delegate to the Constitutional Convention in 1787; member of Congress from Massachusetts 1789–93; commissioner to France 1797–98; governor of Massachusetts 1810–12; and Vice-President 1813–14. During his governorship the legislature of Massachusetts redistricted the State in an arbitrary manner (1811) to secure a majority for the Republicans in the elections for Senators. It was erroneously thought that the redistricting was undertaken at his instigation (whence arose the word "gerrymander," in allusion to the fancied resemblance of a district to a salamander and a map of the new districts of the state).

Gers (zhãr). A department of southern France, capital Auch; part of the ancient Gascony. It is bounded by Lot-et-Garonne on the north, Tarn-et-Garonne and Haute-Garonne on the east, Hautes-Pyrenees, Basses-Pyrenees on the south, and Landes on the west. Area, 2,425 square miles. Population (1891), 304,834.

Gersau (ger'sou). A village in the canton of Schwyz, Switzerland, on the Lake of Lucerne near the Righi. It was a republic from 1390 to the wars of the French Revolution.

Gerson (zher-sōn'), Jean Charlier de. Born at Gerson, Rethunes, Dec. 14, 1363; died at Lyons, July 12, 1429. A noted French theologian. He was chancellor of the University of Paris, and was prominent in the councils of Pisa and Constance, striving for the unity of the church and for ecclesiastical reforms. In 1419 he went to Lyons, where he died. The authorship of the "De imitatione Christi" (which see) has been attributed to him.

Jean Charlier, or Gerson, one of the most respectable and considerable names of the later mediæval literature. Gerson was born in 1363, at a village of the same name in Lorraine. He early entered the College de Navarre, and distinguished himself under Peter d'Ailly, the most famous of the later nominalists. He became Chancellor of the University, received a living in Flanders, and for many years preached in the most constantly attended churches of Paris. He represented the University at the Council of Constance, and, becoming obnoxious to the Burgundian party, sought refuge with one of his brothers at Lyons, where he is said to have taught little children. He died in 1429. Gerson, it is perhaps needless to say, is one of the numerous candidates (but one of the least likely) for the honour of having written the "Imitation."

Gersoppa, Falls of. A cataract in the river Shiravati, India, which here breaks through the western Ghauts about 100 miles southeast of Goa. Height, 960 feet (in four falls).

Gerstäcker (ger'stek-er). Friedrich. Born at Hamburg, May 10, 1816; died at Brunswick, May 31, 1872. A German writer and traveler. In 1837 he went to America, where he traveled extensively until 1843, when he returned to Germany and adopted literature as a profession. During 1849 to 1852 he made a journey around the world. In 1860-61 he traveled in South America. In 1862 he accompanied the Duke of Coburg-Gotha to Egypt and Abyssinia. In 1867 he was in the United States, Mexico, and Venezuela, returning to Germany in 1868. His last years were spent in Brunswick. He was a voluminous writer of novels, tales, and stories of adventure in all parts of the world. Bearing upon America are, among others, "Streif- und Jagdzuge durch die Vereinigten Staaten von Nord-amerika" ("Rambling and Hunting Excursions through the United States of North America," 1849), "Die Regulatoren in Arkansas" ("The Regulators of Arkansas," 1845), "Missisippibilder" ("Mississippi Pictures," 1847-48), "Die Flusspiraten des Missisippi" ("The River Pirates of the Mississippi," 1848), "Amerikanische Wald- und Strombilder" ("American Forest and Stream Pictures," 1849), "Wie ist es denn nun eigentlich in Amerika?" ("How is it then, really, in America?" 1850), "Nach Amerika" ("To America," 1855), "Kalifornische Skizzen" ("California Sketches," 1856). His collected works appeared after his death in 44 volumes (1872-79).

Gerster (gãr'ster), Etelka. Born at Kaschau, June 16, 1857. A Hungarian singer (soprano). She was a pupil of Madame Marchesi at Vienna, and made her first appearance in 1876 at Venice as Linda in "Lucrezia Borgia." She sang with success in all the principal cities of Europe. She came to America in 1878, 1880, and 1887. In 1877 she married C. Gerster, a German violinist.

Gertrude (gėr'tröd), Saint. Died March 17, 659. An abbess of Nivelles in Brabant. She was the daughter of Pippin of Landen, majordomo to Clotaire II., and Itta. On the death of Pippin, Itta built a cloister at Nivelles, which included both a monastery and a nunnery, and Gertrude became abbess of the latter. She is commemorated throughout Brabant on March 17.

Gertrude, Saint, surnamed "The Great." Born in Germany, Jan. 6, 1256; died 1311. A German mystic. She was placed in the convent of Helfta at the age of five, and studied the liberal arts with great zeal until her twenty-fifth year, when, in consequence of supernatural visions, she began to devote herself to the study of the Scriptures and the writings of the fathers. Her visions are recorded in her "Insinuationes divinæ pietatis," the first portion of which appeared in 1662. She is commemorated Nov. 15.

Gertrude. 1. In Shakspere's "Hamlet," the mother of Hamlet, and queen of Denmark. She is a weak woman whose share in her second husband's crime is doubtful. She dies accidentally of poison prepared for Hamlet.

2. The ambitious, extravagant daughter of the goldsmith in Marston, Chapman, and Jonson's "Eastward Ho."

Gertrude of Wyoming. A poem by Thomas Campbell, published in 1809.

Gertruydenberg, or Gertruidenberg (gėr-troi'den-berg), D. Geertruidenberg (gār-troi'den-berg). A town in the province of North Brabant, Netherlands, 25 miles southeast of Rotterdam. It was the scene of an unsuccessful conference June 29–July 27, 1710, designed to terminate the war between Louis XIV. and the Allies.

Louis agreed to give up—(1) to the Dutch, ten fortresses in Flanders as a barrier; (2) to the Empire, Luxembourg, Strasburg, Brisach; (3) to Savoy, Nice, Savoy, and Fenestrelles; (4) to England, Newfoundland. But though he would allow the Archduke Charles to be King of Spain, he refused to assist the Allies to dethrone Philip from Madrid.

Geryon (jē'ri-on), or Geryones (jē-ri'ō-nēz). [Gr. Γηρυών or Γηρυόνης.] In Greek mythology, a monster with three heads or three bodies and powerful wings, son of Chrysaor and Callirrhoe, dwelling in the island of Erythea in the far west. He possessed a large herd of red cattle guarded by Eurytion (his shepherd) and the two-headed dog Orthus. Hercules carried these cattle away, and slew Geryon.

Gés (zhās), or Crans (krānz). A race of Brazilian Indians in northern Goyaz and western Maranhão: so named by ethnologists because the names of their numerous clans generally end in gé ("father, ancestor") or cran ("son, descendant"). The Portuguese of Maranhão called them Timbiras. Among the best-known clans are the Apinages, Gaviões, and Macamacras. In all the language is essentially the same. They are large, strong, and often handsome Indians; lead a wandering life during the dry season, and fixed villages and small plantations for the rainy months; never use hammocks, but sleep on raised beds made of sticks; and, in a wild state, go entirely naked. Until about 1830 they were continually at war with the whites. Latterly the Apinages and some others have been drawn into mission villages. They still number many thousands. Martius united the Gés number many thousands. Martius united the Gés with the Caribs, Tupis, Cavaraes, Acroas, Tecunas, and many other tribes in eastern, central, and northern Brazil, in what he called the Ges or Crans stock; but this classification has been generally abandoned, and the true position of the Gés is doubtful.

Gesta Romanorum (jes'tā rō-mā-nō'rum). [L., 'deeds of the Romans.'] A popular collection of stories in Latin, compiled, perhaps in England, at the end of the 13th or the beginning of the 14th century.

This compilation long retained its popularity; was printed as early as 1473; reprinted at Louvain a few months later; again in 1480; translated into Dutch in 1484; printed again in 1488; and went through six or seven editions in this country during the succeeding century. The earliest printed Latin texts contained 150 or 181 sections. In the next following editions the number quickly rose to 181, and these 181 tales form the commonly received text. There was a German edition at Augsburg in 1489 containing only 95 tales, of which some are not in the accepted Latin version. In like manner, including tales not in the Latin manuscript text, there is an English series of 43 or six sections. The name of the work, "Gesta Romanorum" ("Deeds of the Romans), commonly applied to any record of the history of Rome, is justified by little more than the arbitrary, but not invariable, reference of tale after tale to the life or reign of Roman emperors, ancient or then modern, as Conrad, or Frederick or Henry II. The book itself refers to the "Gesta Romanorum" as simply the Annals of Rome. Thus one tale, to illustrate "the Sin of Pride," begins with the sentence, "We read in the 'Gesta Romanorum' of a prince called Dunpey," and proceeds to tell about Cæsar and Pompey, adding a moral in the usual form. It may be that a first collection of these tales was, like this one, in connection with the Roman history, illustrations of such Roman history, each with its ready-made moral or "application" added for the preacher's use; but that by the addition of more striking marvels and much livelier matter, with omission of familiar bits of ancient history, the original convenient form of Story and Application and the original name also being retained, the work itself became a mere child's picture shape. Morley, English Writers, III. 364, 367.

Geta (jē'tā), Publius Septimius. Born at Milan, May, 189: assassinated by order of Caracalla, Feb., 212. Second son of Septimius Severus and Julia Donna, brother of Caracalla, and joint emperor with him 211–212.

Getæ (jē'tē). [Sometimes in L. form Getæ; L. Getæ, Getæ, Getæ. The name is not connected with that of the Gauti or that of the Gothi or Goths.] In ancient history, a Thracian people dwelling in the modern Bulgaria, and later in the modern Bessarabia.

In ancient times the countries north of the Danube mouths were inhabited by a people called Getæ (in Latin Getæ), — the good Saul sent to live among this people when Augustus banished him from Rome. Now in the third century after Christ the Goths came and dwelt in the land of the Getæ, and were mixed and blended with the native inhabitants; and so the Romans came to think that Goths and Getes were only two names for the same people, or rather two different ways of pronouncing the same word. Even the historian Jordanes, himself a Goth, actually calls his book a Getic history ("De rebus Geticis"), and mixes up the traditions of his own people with the traditions of the Getæ found in books about the Getæ. In modern times some great scholars have tried to prove that the Getes really were Goths, and that the early territory of the Gothic nation included all the way from the Vistula to the Black Sea. But the ablest authorities are now mostly agreed that this is a mistake, and that when the Goths migrated to the region they found there only a few Getæ, amongst a people of a different race, speaking a foreign tongue. Bradley, Story of the Goths, p. 19.

Gethsemane (geth-sem'a-nē). [Heb., 'oil-press'; Gr. Γεθσημανή.] In New Testament history, a garden or orchard east of Jerusalem, near the brook Kedron.

Gettysburg, Battle of. A victory of the Federals under General Meade over the Confederates under Lee at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, July 1–3, 1863. General Lee, while invading Pennsylvania, was compelled to retreat by the Army of the Potomac under General Meade, which was therefore called back from Maryland to venture a battle expecting in case of victory to march on Washington, and in case of defeat to secure a direct line of retreat to Virginia; and gave orders for his army to concentrate at Gettysburg. On July 1 the Federal advance under Major-General Reynolds met the Confederate advance at Gettysburg. An engagement ensued, in which both sides were reinforced. Reynolds was killed, and was succeeded by General Howard, who maintained his position on Cemetery Hill south of the town, demanding reinforcements during the afternoon. On the 2d the Federal army occupied a strong position in the form of a semicircle with its convex center toward Gettysburg, and including the high ground of Cemetery Hill and Round Top. About noon Lee began a general attack on the Federal center and left, which was followed by an attack on the right. He lost the day in every quarter. The battle on the 2d demonstrated that the key to General Meade's position was Cemetery Hill, which was defended by a battery of about 80 guns. Accordingly on the 3d, General Lee massed upward of 100 guns on Seminary Ridge, with which he opened on Cemetery Hill about 1 P. M. The bombardment, which lasted an hour and a half, was followed by two grand assaults. Both were repulsed. General Lee retreated on the 4th. The losses in the great battle during this three days' battle numbered between 50,000 and 60,000 on each side. The Federal loss was 2,834 killed, 13,709 wounded, and 6,643 missing, making a total of 23,186. The total Confederate loss was 31,621. See Pickett.

Ghiberti (gē-ber'tē), Lorenzo. Born at Florence about 1378; died at Florence, 1455. An Italian sculptor. He learned the goldsmith's craft from his stepfather Bartolo Michele, and then studied with Lorenzo di Bartolo. He first made himself known as a painter by his work on the frescos of the palace of Carlo Malatesta di Rimini. He was recalled from Rimini in 1401 to compete for the doors of the baptistery at Florence. The trial of skill lay between Ghiberti and Brunelleschi of Florence, Quercia and Valdambrini of Siena, and Niccolo d'Arezzo and Simone from Colli in the Val d'Elsa. Ghiberti won, and the first door was begun in 1403 and finished in 1424. During these twenty-one years twenty-six assistants, among whom were Donatello and Pisano, assisted in modeling and casting the work. Its completion was immediately followed by an order to make the remaining door of the baptistery. This, the great work of his life, was begun in 1424 and finished in 1447. The subjects were selected, at the request of the deputies by Leonardo Bruni (Aretino). When Ghiberti finished these doors he was about seventy years old. In the meantime he had received and executed many commissions for statues, bas-reliefs, and goldsmith's work, and had also spent some time in Rome. Gipsies (jip'siz). [Orig. Egyptians, later Egyptians, Gypsies, the Gipsies being popularly supposed to be Egyptians.] A peculiar vagabond race which appeared in England for the first time about the beginning of the 16th century, and in eastern Europe at least two centuries earlier, and is now found in every country of Europe, as well as in parts of Asia, Africa, and America. The Gipsies are distinguishable from the peoples among whom they rove by their bodily appearance and by their language. Their skin is of a dark shade, lithe, and agile; skin of a tawny color; eyes large, black, and brilliant; hair long, coal black, and often ringleted; mouth well shaped; and teeth remarkably white. Ethnologists generally concur in regarding the Gipsies as descendants of some obscure Hindu tribe. They pursue various nomadic occupations, being tinkers, basket-makers, fortune-tellers, jobbers in horses, &c., sometimes sport-dealers, and are entirely with the view to profit. They appear to be destitute of any system of religion, but traces of various fetishistic practices are found in their language and customs. The name Gipsy is also sometimes applied to or assumed by other vagrants of like habits.

The inner fortress is of the 10th century, the outer walls of the early 13th. The great hall has fine windows framed between clustered colonnettes.

Girgashites (gēr'ga-shits). See the extract.

As for the Girgashite who is coupled with the Jebusite (Gen. xv. 21), his place has been already fixed by the ethnographical table of Genesis. He there appears between the Amorite and the Hivite, and consequently in that northern part of the country in which the Hivites were more especially found. Further than this conjecture alone can lead us. Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 122.

Girgeh (jer'je). 1. A province of Upper Egypt. —2. A town in the province of Girgeh, situated on the Nile in lat. 26° 18′ N. Population (1882), 15,000.

Girgenti (jēr-jen'tē). A province in southwestern Sicily. Area, 1,172 square miles. Population (1891), 337,983.

Girgenti. The capital of the province of Girgenti, Sicily, situated on the Girgenti, near the coast, in lat. 37° 18′ N., long. 13° 34′ E.: the ancient Roman Agrigentum and the Greek Akragas (which see). Pindar calls it the most beautiful of mortal habitations. It has also considerable archæological interest from its abundant remains of Doric temples and other Greek structures dating from before the Carthaginian conquest. All the temples belong to the finest period of architecture. The so-called temple of Concord is one of the most perfect surviving monuments of Hellenic antiquity. It is a Doric peripteros of 6 by 13 columns, on a style-bate of 3 steps, measuring (steps included) 64 by 128 feet. The base diameter of the columns is 4 ½ feet, their height 22 ½. There are two columns in antis in both pronaos and opisthodomos. The cella has a pronaos and opisthodomos, each of the full width of the cella, and is most imposing in effect. The temple of Hera Lacinia, of the first half of the 5th century B. C., is now a ruin. It is a Doric peripteros of 6 by 13 columns, measuring (steps included) 64 by 128 feet. The base diameter of the columns is 4½ feet, their height 21. The cella had two columns in antis in both pronaos and opisthodomos, and retains a podium of the base of the statue. The temple of Zeus (Jupiter) is a very large 5th-century Greek Doric temple of unusual plan. It was pseudoperipteral, with 7 engaged columns on the fronts and 14 on the flanks, and measured 350 feet in length, 180 in width, and 120 in height. The interior of the cella was surrounded with pilasters supporting an entablature and a continuous frieze to receive the ceiling-beams. There was a pronaos and an opisthodomos, lighted by windows between the semi-columns. In the eastern pediment there is a gigantomachy in high relief, and in the western an Iliupersis. The temple of Castor and Pollux is a Doric peripteros of 6 by 13 columns, measuring (steps included) 51 by 111½ feet. The base diameter of the columns is 3′, their height 21½. Only four columns of the northwest angle are standing, with their entablature and a portion of the pediment. The rough stone has a coating of fine stucco, upon which the painted decoration was executed. The temple of Heracles is a Doric peripteros of 6 by 15 columns, measuring steps included) 54 by 132 feet. The base diameter of the columns is 3′, their height 21′ 3″ (which (4′ diameters). There were inner portions before both pronaos and opisthodomos. Fragments of its polychromed decoration are preserved at Palermo. The prætor Verres attempted to steal its colt statue, but was forcibly hindered by the citizens. The city has a cathedral and a museum. It was for a time a Saracen possession, and was a rich bishopric in the middle ages. In the port, Porto Empedocle, has a large export of sulphur. Population (estimated, 1891), 24,000.

Gladstone (glad'stōn). William Ewart. Born at Liverpool, Dec. 29, 1809. An eminent British statesman, financier, and orator. Both his parents were natives of Scotland, his father, Sir John Gladstone, Bart., a Liverpool merchant, tracing descent from an old Scottish family named Gledstanes (or "hawkstones"). He was educated at Eton and at Christ Church, Oxford, graduating in 1831 with highest honors both in classics and mathematics (a double first-class). He was returned to Parliament in 1832, in the first election after the passing of the Reform Bill, as Tory member for Newark, a pocket borough of the Duke of Newcastle. His exceptional political abilities were at once recognized by his party, and in the short-lived administration of Sir Robert Peel (Dec. 1834–April, 1835) he was made first a junior lord of the treasury, and then under-secretary for the colonies. On the return of Peel to office in Sept., 1841, he was appointed vice-president of the Board of Trade, and had the principal share in working out and expounding the elaborate scheme of tariff revision that was then adopted. In June, 1843, he became president of the Board of Trade, with a seat in the cabinet. In Jan., 1845, he left the ministry on account of the proposed grant to the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth, he was again chancellor of the exchequer in Peel's cabinet, at variance with opinions he had published although he now could and subsequently did support it as a private member. The Peel ministry was reorganized in Dec., 1845, and he was secretary of state for the colonies until its fall in June, 1846. Six and a half years then elapsed before he again held office, and during that period (especially in the earlier years of it) he was gradually forging ahead, in spite of his native Conservative instincts, toward that political Liberalism of which he was latterly the most conspicuous champion. In Dec., 1852, a coalition ministry of Whigs and Peelites was formed under the Earl of Aberdeen, Gladstone taking what appears to have been his strongest place—that of chancellor of the exchequer. He held the same office at first in the Liberal ministry of Lord Palmerston, formed Feb., 1855, but retired with the other Peelites in a few weeks. During the next few years the Peelites gradually drifted into a special mission as lord high commissioner extraordinary to the Ionian Islands. From June, 1858, to July, 1859, he was again chancellor of the exchequer under Lord Palmerston and Earl Russell, and after Palmerston's death he was leader of the House of Commons. The defeat of a reform bill which he introduced brought the Tories back to power, to pass themselves an important reform measure; but on Dec. 9, 1865, he reached the highest dignity attainable by a British subject—that of prime minister. He was defeated and resigned position he held less than four times—Dec., 1868, to Feb., 1874; April, 1880, to June, 1885; Feb. to Aug., 1886, and Aug., 1892, to March, 1894—and "Grand Old Man" was his office on account of his advanced age and failing physical powers. Besides being prime minister and first lord of the treasury, he has occupied almost every office under the crown during his first administration and part of his second, and lord privy seal during his third and fourth. The history of his various ministries is the history of the British empire for the time. One of the first measures which he carried as premier was the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and the condition of Ireland has throughout his leadership been a question of a century in office. Opposition been the object of his peculiar concern. He prepared and introduced (1886 and 1893) two bills for providing that country with a system of legislature; but both were defeated (see Home Rule Bills). With the exception of about a year and a half, he has sat continuously in the House of Commons since 1832. He retired from Parliament in Jan., 1846, because his views had diverged from those of its patron, and subsequently represented the University of Oxford (1847–65), South Lancashire (1865–68), Greenwich (1868–80), and Midlothian (or Edinburghshire) since 1880. He is understood to have been offered a peerage on more than one occasion, but has declined that honor, preferring the great commoncy of which he is by far the most prominent man in the politics of his time, he has found leisure for considerable contributions to literature. His published works include "Church Principles considered in their Results" (1840), "Remarks on Relations to the Church" (1845), "Letters on the State Relations of the Neapolitan Government" (1851), "Studies on Homer and the Homeric Age" (1858), "Juventus Mundi" (1869), pamphlets on "The Vatican Decrees" (1874–75) and "Bulgarian Horrors" (1876, 1877), "Homeric Synchronism" (1876), "Gleanings of Past Years" (1879), etc., besides numerous articles and pamphlets.

Glas (glās), John. Born at Auchtermuchty, Fife, Sept. 21, 1695: died at Perth, Nov. 2, 1773. A Scottish clergyman, founder of the sect of Glassites or Sandemanians.

Glasgow (glasʹgō). A seaport in Lanarkshire, Scotland, situated on the Clyde in lat. 55° 52′ N., long. 4° 15′ W., the largest city in Scotland and second city in Great Britain: next to Liverpool and London, the principal British seaport. It is the terminus of several transatlantic lines of steamers (Anchor, Allan, State). It is especially famous for iron and steel ship-building, being the chief British city in this regard. It manufactures chemicals, cotton goods, woolen goods, iron, sewing-machines, machinery, etc.; has a great trade in coal; and has important bleaching and dyeing works. The cathedral, in the East End of the city, was founded in the 13th, but is chiefly in the Early English style, with some numerous but small lancets in the clearstory, faceted windows, narrow triforium transepts with great windows, square chevet, and central tower and spire. The interior is effective: it has a flat wooden ceiling, and all the windows filled with modern Munich glass. The crypt is of unusual beauty: it is admirably vaulted, and its 65 columns possess finely carved capitals. The cathedral is 320 by 63 feet, the height of nave, 90. The length is the same as that of St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York. Glasgow University was founded in 1450. The present large building, 560 by 330 feet, is a modified Early English style, with tall central tower and spire, was first occupied in 1870: it is by Sir G. Gilbert Scott. Glasgow became a royal burgh about 1175. For parliamentary purposes it is arranged in seven divisions, each returning one member to the House of Commons. Population (1891), 618,479.

Glassites (glāsʹits), Mrs. Hannah. The author of a popular book called "The Art of Cookery." It was published in 1747, and at one time its authorship was attributed to Dr. John Hill. Mrs. Glasse wrote other books on similar subjects. The ironical proverb "First catch your hare," attributed to her, is not in "The Art of Cookery," but was probably suggested by the words "Take your hare when it is cased," i. e., skinned.

Glassius (glash'i-us), Salomo (Salomon Glass). Born at Sondershausen, Germany, 1593; died at Gotha, Germany, July 27, 1656. A noted German theologian and biblical critic, professor of theology at Jena, and superintendent of the churches and schools of the ducky of Saxe-Gotha. He wrote "Philologia sacra" (Jena, 1623), etc.

Glastonbury (glas'ton-ber-i). [ME. Glastenbury, Glassenburg, Glassanburg, Glastinbury, AS. Glastingaburh, city of the Glastings.] A town in Somerset, England, 21 miles south of Bristol. Its abbey, founded in Roman times, was refounded under the 10th century. The great early-pointed church, of which the picturesque ruins are still standing, is Perpendicular, and was begun by Henry II. and consecrated by Henry VIII. It was 558 feet long. The fine chapel of St. Joseph at the east end is the oldest portion. The Abbot's Kitchen, of the 14th century, is of interest. The plan is square with abundant buttresses, but the high stone roof is octagonal; it terminates in a louver. There are no huge fireplaces. Several other interesting structures belonging to the abbey have been converted to modern uses. Glastonbury is associated in legend with Joseph of Arimathea, who is said to have visited it and, in case of possession, planted his staff, which took root and became the famous Glastonbury thorn that bursts into leaf on Christmas eve. The Isle of Avalon, where Arthur was buried, is also here. See Avalon.

There is something very odd in an English gentile name suddenly displacing the British name; there is something suspicious in the order in which the two Celtic and British names translate one another, in the transparent striving to see an element of class in both. Glastonbury, in fact, must be borne in mind, is as distinctly an English gentile name as any in the whole range of English nomenclature; Glastonbury is a mere corruption; the syllable which has taken a place to which it has no right in Huntingdon and Abingdon has in Glastonbury been driven out of a place to which it has the most perfect right. The true origin of the name must, in a grotesque shape, be that legend of Glaesting and his sow, a mutilated English legend, which either William of Malmesbury himself or some interpolator at Glastonbury has strangely thrust into the midst of the British legends. Glaesting's lost sow leads him by a long journey to an apple-tree by the old church; pleased with the land, he takes his family, the Glaestings, to dwell there.

Glenvarloch, Lord. See Olifant, Nigel.

Glessariæ (gle-sā'ri-ē). [L., sc. insulæ, 'amber islands.'] See the extract.

The principal district for the tide-washed amber was the coast between the Helder and the promontory of Jutland. From the Rhine to the estuary of the Elbe stretched a chain of islands, called Glessariæ and Electrides by the ancients, which are now much altered in number and extent by the incessant inroads of the sea. Here a Roman fleet in Nero's time collected 13,000 lbs. of the precious "glessum" in a single visit; and the sailors brought home picturesque accounts of the natives picking up the glassy fossil at the flood-tide and in the pools left by the ebb; "and it is so light," they said, "that it rolls about and seems to hang in the shallow water."

Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 60.

Gleyre (glār), Charles Gabriel. Born at Chevilly, Vaud, Switzerland, May 2, 1806: died at Paris, May 5, 1874. A Swiss historical painter.

Glister (glis'tėr). In Middleton's play "The Family of Love," a doctor of physic.

Globe, The. A celebrated London theater built by Richard and Cuthbert Burbage in 1599. When their "theater" in Shoreditch was taken down, the materials were carried to Bankside and used in the erection of the Globe. It was hexagonal in shape and open to the sky in the middle, the stage and galleries only being covered with a thatched roof. Over the door was the sign of the house, Hercules supporting a globe. The interior was arranged on the plan of the inn-yards where entertainments had formerly been given. It was circular and had three galleries. At the back of the stage were two columns which supported a gallery about 10 or 12 feet high, and between these hung the curtain. On the stage itself sat a dozen or twenty gallants who paid sixpence extra for the privilege. The Globe was a public theater — that is, not under the patronage of any great personage. Shakspere played here, and he with Heminng, Condell, and others shared in the profits. It was a summer house, Blackfriars being the winter house of the same company. The Globe was burned in 1613, but immediately rebuilt at a cost of £1,400. It was pulled down during the Puritan regime in 1644, and the site is now occupied by Barclay and Perkins's brewery. Shakspere wrote exclusively for the Blackfriars and Globe theaters, and most of the plays of Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, Ford, Massinger, Chapman, and others were first performed there. The present Globe Theatre in Wych street was built in 1868.

Glockner (glok'ner), or Grossglockner (grōs-glok'ner). A mountain in Austria-Hungary, on the confines of Tyrol, Carinthia, and Salzburg. It is the highest peak in the easternmost division of the Alps, and is celebrated for the extensive view it commands. It belongs to the group of the Hohe Tauern. Height, 12,454 feet.

Gloster (glos'tėr), or Gloucester, Earl of. A character in Shakspere's "King Lear," the father of Edgar and Edmund.

The subordinate plot of Gloster and his sons was probably taken from the episodical chapter in Sidney's "Arcadia" entitled "The Pitiful State and Story of the Paphlagonian unkind King and his kind Son; first related by the son, then by the blind father."

Hudson, Introd. to King Lear.

Gloucester (glos'tėr). [Also formerly Gloster; ME. Gloucester, Gloucestre, Gloweceastre, AS. Gleáweceaster; from L. Glevum, the Roman name, and AS. ceaster, city.] 1. A county in west midland England. It is bounded by Worcester and Warwick on the north, Oxford, Berks, and Wilts on the east, Wilts and somerset on the south, Monmouth on the west, and Hereford on the northwest. It include s the Cotswold Hills, the Forest of Dean, and the vales of Gloucester and Berkeley. Its five divisions each return one member to the House of Commons. Area, 1,243 square miles. Population (1891), 599,954.

2. The capital of Gloucestershire, England, a city and county of itself, and a parliamentary borough, situated on the Severn in lat. 51° 52′ N., long. 2° 16′ W.; the British Caer-glowe and Roman Glevum. It is an important commercial town. The cathedral is in its present form a Perpendicular building almost throughout, except in the lower part of the nave, but is of much earlier foundation. The plan is early Norman. There is a high central tower, covered with tracery, and a long projecting lady chapel. There is an excellent 14th-century porch, with statues over the arched entrance. The arches and circular pillars of the nave are impressive, and the choir is one of the richest examples of the Perpendicular style. The whole east end is occupied by a great window with fine glass, the wall-spaces are covered with paneling, and the vaulting rests on a perfect network of ribs. The choir is assigned to 1351, and is held to prove that the Perpendicular style originated here. The dimensions of the cathedral are 420 by 144 feet; height of nave 68, of choir 86. The Perpendicular cloisters, with beautiful fan-vaulting, and its arcades filled with glazed tracery, is the finest of its type in England. The chapter-house and crypt are Norman. Gloucester resisted the Royalist army under Charles I. in 1643. It sends one member to the House of Commons. Population (1891), 39,444.

Glevum was a town of great importance, as standing not only on the Severn near the place where it opened out into the British Channel, but also lying near to the great Roman iron district of the Forest of Dean.
Wright, Celt, p. 136.

Gloucester. A city and seaport in Essex County, Massachusetts, situated on the peninsula of Cape Ann in lat. 42° 37′ N., long. 70° 40′ W. It is the chief port of cod and mackerel fisheries in the United States, and exports granite. It was unsuccessfully attacked by the British in 1775 and 1814. Population (1890), 24,651.

Glover, Richard. Born at London, 1712: died there, Nov. 25, 1785. An English poet. He was the son of a Hamburg merchant and entered into business with his father. His chief work, an epic poem, "Leonidas," appeared in 1737. He enlarged it and republished it in 1770, and it has been translated into French and German. Its success was partly due to its usefulness to the opponents of Walpole. He also published "London, etc." (1739), "Boadicea" (a tragedy, 1753), "Medea" (1761), and "The Athenaid," an epic in 20 books, published in 1787 by his daughter.

Glover, Robert. Born at Ashford, Kent, 1544: died at London, April 10, 1588. An English genealogist, appointed Somerset herald in 1571. He left a large number of manuscripts, which have been used by later writers.

Glover, Stephen. Born at London, 1812: died there, Dec. 7, 1870. An English composer and teacher. He wrote over fifteen hundred popular songs, ballads, and pianoforte pieces.

Gnomic Poets. See the extract.

The term Gnomic is sometimes applied to a certain number of Greek poets, inadvisably. There is no definite principle for meeting some and including others in the class. It has, however, been usual to apply this name to Solon, Phocylides, Theognis, and Simonides of Ceos. Yet there seems no reason to exclude some portions of Callinus, Tyrtæus, Mimnermus, and Xenophanes. These poets, it will be observed, are all writers of the elegy. Some of the lyric poets, however, and tamborgraphers, such as Simonides of Amorgos and Archilochus, have strong claims to admission into the list. Round the adjective gnomic name implies, gnomic poets are simply those who embody sententious maxims on life and morals in their verses; and though we do not find the most celebrated masters of this style composed elegies, we may trace the thread of gnomic thought in almost all the writers of their time.
Symonds, Studies of the Greek Poets, I. 256.

Gnossus. See Cnossus.

Gnostics (nos′tiks). [From Gr. γνωστικός, knowing, whence Lat. Gnostici, a Gnostic.] Certain rationalistic sects which arose in the Christian church in the 1st century, flourished in the 2d, and had almost entirely disappeared by the 6th. The Gnostics held that knowledge rather than faith is the road to heaven, and pretended to a certain knowledge of religious mysteries. They rejected the literal interpretation of the Scriptures, and attempted to combine their teachings with those of the Greek and Oriental philosophies and religions. They held that God was unknowable and the unapproachable; that from him proceeded, by emanation, subordinate deities termed æons, from whom again proceeded other and inferior spirits. The Gnostics were in general agreed in believing in the principles of dualism and Docetism and in the existence of a demiurge or world-creator. Christ they regarded as a superior eon who had descended from the infinite God in order to subdue the god or eon of this world. Their chief seats were in Syria and Egypt, but their doctrines were taught everywhere, and at an early date they separated into a variety of sects.

He remained in Peru many years, became professor of mathematics at the University of Lima, subsequently he had charge of the college for midshipmen at Cadiz, Spain. He was the author of several treatises on earthquakes and astronomy, as well as Spanish America, and a history of the French Academy of Sciences.

Godin des Odonais (gō-dan' dāz ō-dō-nā'), Isabel. Born in Riobamba, Peru, 1728: died at Saint-Amand, France, after 1773. The wife of Jean Godin des Odonais. She came to France in 1743. In 1769 she started with her brothers on a small company to descend the Napo and Amazon and join her husband in Cayenne. The boat was lost, and all the party perished except herself. Godin wandered alone in the forest for 9 days. When she was finally found by some friendly Indians her hair is said to have become white. She descended the Amazon in a canoe, and, after a year, she rejoined her husband after a separation of 19 years.

Godin des Odonais, Jean. Born at Saint-Amand, 1712: died there, 1792. A French naturalist, cousin of Louis Godin, whom he accompanied to Peru in 1735. He remained there as a professor at the College of Quito, studying the flora and Indian languages. In 1756 he went to Cayenne, and made that colony, Brazilian Guiana, and the Amazon, and finally returned to France in 1775. He published several works on the plants, animals, and Indian languages of South America.

Godiva (gō-dī'va). [ML. Godiva, from AS. Godgifu, gift of God: equiv. to Dorothea or Theodora.] Flourished about the middle of the 11th century. The wife of Leofric, earl of Mercia, celebrated in the annals of Coventry, Warwickshire, England. She was a woman of great beauty and piety, the benefactress of numerous churches and monasteries. According to the legend, she begged her husband to relieve Coventry of a burdensome toll, and he consented on the condition that she should ride naked through the market-place. This she did, covered only by her hair, and won relief for the people. Later versions of the story, the people were commanded to keep within their houses, and not look upon her. One fellow "peeping Tom"—disobeyed, and was miraculously struck with blindness. Her festival is still celebrated at Coventry.

Godman (gōd'man), Frederick Du Cane. Born about 1840. An English naturalist. In 1870 he published the "Natural History of the Azores." Shortly after he planned an elaborate scientific survey of Mexico and Central America, acquiring by purchase, and by employing collectors, immense series of specimens of the plants and animals of those regions. These have been described in the "Biologia Central-Americana," edited by Godman and Salvin. One hundred and ten numbers have been issued up to 1894.

Gododin, The. A Welsh poem by Aneurin, on the seven days' battle of Cattraeth in 603. The author was probably present at the battle. It consists, in its present form, of over 900 lines, and has been several times translated, either wholly or in part. Gray's "Death of Hoel" is part translation part imitation of a portion of it. The Rev. John Williams ab Ithel translated the whole and published it in 1852, and portions of it have been translated by Henry Morley. See Aneurin.

Gödöllö (gö'del-lö'). A town of Hungary, 15 miles northeast of Budapest. Here, April 6, 1848, the Hungarian insurgents under Gorgey defeated the Austrians under Prince Windischgrätz.

Godolphin (gō-dol'fin), Sidney, first Earl of Godolphin. Born in Cornwall, England, probably about 1635: died Sept. 15, 1712. An English statesman and financier. He became page of honor to Charles II. in 1662; was appointed master of the robes in 1678; represented Helston in the House of Commons 1668–79 and Penrhyn 1681–85; Mawes 1679–81; and was first lord of the treasury 1690–97 and 1700–01. During the reign of William III. he kept up a secret correspondence with James II. at St.-Germain. He became in 1702 premier and lord high treasurer, in which capacity he vigorously supported Marlborough during his absence on the Continent in the War of the Spanish Succession. He was created earl of Godolphin in 1706, and was dismissed from office in 1710 at the fall of the Marlboroughs.

Godolphin Barb, The. One of the three Oriental sires from which the thoroughbred horse is derived. See Darley Arabian and Byerly Turk. He was probably a bare-footed Arab, and was brought from Paris in the reign of George II. He died in 1753. The traditions surrounding this horse were woven into a novelette by Rogers Sue in 1825. From the Godolphin springs the Matchem branch of the thoroughbred horse.

He obtained the favor of Queen Maria Louisa and Charles IV., and rose rapidly to an important position in the state. He became duke of Alcudia and lieutenant-general in 1792, prime minister in 1795, and in 1795, for securing a peace with France, received the title of Prince of the Peace. He signed the treaty of San Ildefonso with France Aug 29, 1796; married Maria Teresa de Bourbon in 1797; and resigned from the ministry in 1798. In 1801 he commanded the army against Portugal and secured the treaty of Badajoz. He was made generalissimo and high admiral of Spain. He attached himself to Napoleon, and signed the treaty of Fontainebleau which seek. Meanwhile he had become an object of popular hatred, which burst out in a riot (March 18, 1808), from which he narrowly escaped. His arrest was ordered, but he escaped through Napoleon's influence, and lived later at Rome and Paris.

God Save the King (or Queen), The English national anthem: words and music probably composed by Henry Carey. It was first performed in 1740. It is sometimes attributed to John Bull (1607): it has also been assigned a Scottish or French origin. The tune was adopted in France in 1775, and was afterward used in the Danish, Prussian, and German national air. Beethoven introduced it in his "Battle Symphony"; Weber has used it in three or four compositions. The American national hymn, "My Country, 'tis of Thee," was written by Dr. Samuel Francis Smith, and published in 1843: the music is that of "God Save the King."

Godunoff (gō-dō-nof'), Boris Feodorovitch. Born 1552: died April 13, 1605. A Russian czar. He was the chief member of the regency during the reign of the imbecile Feodor Ivanovitch (1584–98), who was married to Godunoff's sister Irene. He was elected to the throne on the death of Feodor in 1598, having, it is said, previously caused the death of the czarevitch Dmitri.

Godwin (god'win), or Godwine. Died April 14, 1053. Earl of the West Saxons. He accompanied Canut on his visit to Denmark in 1019, and is said to have fought with distinction in an expedition against the Wends. He shortly after married Gytha, a relative by marriage of Canut, and was appointed earl of the West Saxons. On the death of Canut in 1035 he at first supported the cause of Harthanuut, but afterward espoused that of Harold, with whom he was generally implicated in the murder of the English atheling Alfred, half-brother of Harthacnut and son of Emma by her first husband, Æthelred the Unready. In 1042 he was instrumental in securing the election of Edward the Confessor in opposition to the Danish prince Svend Estrithson. He married his daughter Edith or Eadgyth to Edward in 1045. His position, however, as the most powerful subject in the kingdom excited the jealousy of the court, and he was exiled in 1051, but was recalled in the following year.

Godwin, Francis. Born at Havington, Northamptonshire, England, 1561: died 1633. An Englishbishop and author. He was appointed bishop of Llandaff in 1601, and was translated to the see of Hereford in 1617. His chief work is "A Catalogue of the Bishops of England" (1601).

Godwin, Mrs. (Mary Wollstonecraft). Born at London, April 27, 1759: died at London, Sept. 10, 1797. An English author. She was employed by Johnson as a reader and translator, and for five years assisted in this way her family, who were very poor. In 1791 she first met William Godwin, and after one or two other connections, especially with Gilbert Imlay, who deserted her, she went to live with him in 1796. The expectation of a child induced them to marry in 1797. The birth of the child (who was the second wife of the poet Shelley) proved fatal to her. Her chief work was "Vindication of the Rights of Woman" (1792).

Godwin, Parke. Born at Paterson, N. J., Feb. 25, 1816. An American journalist and author. He was connected with the "New York" Evening Post" 1837–53 (except one year), a connection which he renewed in 1865. He has published "History of France" (1850), "A Biography of William Cullen Bryant" (1883–84).

Godwin, William. Born at Wisbech, England, March 3, 1756; died at London, April 7, 1836. An English novelist, historian, and political and miscellaneous writer. His father was a dissenting minister, and he became one himself, preaching from 1777 to 1782, when his faith in Christianity was shaken by study of the French philosophers, and he devoted himself to literature. He was a sympathizer with the French Revolution, and became the representative of English radicalism. The marriage institution he regarded as a fetter, and he objected to marriage on principle. His works include "Inquiry concerning Political Justice, etc." (1793), "History of the Commonwealth" (1824–28), the novels "Caleb Williams" (1794), "St. Leon" (1799), "Mandeville" (1817), etc. He also published histories of Rome, Greece, and England, a "Pantheon," and "Fables" under the pseudonym of Edward Baldwin. Compare Godwin, Mrs. (Mary Wollstonecraft).

Goes e Vasconcellos (goz ē vas-kōn-sāl'ōs), Zacharias de. Born at Valença, Bahia, Nov. 5, 1815; died at Rio de Janeiro, Dec. 28, 1877. A Brazilian statesman. He was repeatedly elected deputy, and was senator from 1864; was president of several provinces, including the newly created province of Paraná, the government of which he organized in 1853; was a member of several ministries, and was three times premier (1861, 1864–65, and 1866–68). During the last period the war with Paraguay was at its height. In politics he was a moderate liberal.

Goethe (gē'te), Johann Wolfgang von. Born at Frankfort-on-the-Main, Aug. 28, 1749; died at Weimar, March 22, 1832. A famous German poet, dramatist, and prose-writer: the greatest name in German literature. His father, Johann Caspar Goethe (1710–82), was a well-to-do man who had the title of imperial councilor. His mother was Katharina Elisabeth Textor (1731–1803), the daughter of a magistrate. His early education was under the personal direction of his father. In 1765 he matriculated at Leipsic for the study of jurisprudence. In the autumn of 1768 he returned ill to Frankfort, and in 1770 went to the University of Strasburg. At this year occurred a love-affair with Friederike Brion (died 1813, unmarried) at Sesenheim, and the beginning of his friendship with Herder. In 1771 he obtained the degree of licentiate of law, and returned to Frankfort. In 1772 he went as a practitioner in the imperial chamber of justice to Wetzlar, where he met Charlotte Buff, the Lotte of "Werther." Six months later he suddenly left Wetzlar and returned to Frankfort. In 1774 began his friendship with Lavater and F. H. Jacobi, and, more important still for its consequences, that with Karl August, Duke of Saxe-Weimar. In 1774–75 he was engaged for a short time, in Frankfort, to Anna Elizabeth Schonemann (married in 1778 to the Baron von Turkheim: died 1817, "Lili" of his lyrics). In 1775, at the invitation of Karl August, who had succeeded to the dukedom, Goethe went to Weimar, where he subsequently lived; in 1776 he was made privy councilor of legation, with a vote in the council of state; in 1779 he was with the duke in Potsdam and Berlin; in 1779 he was made privy councilor; in 1782 he was ennobled and made president of the ducal chamber; in the summer of 1786–88 he was in Italy; in Karlsbad. From there, in Sept., 1786, he set out for Italy, whence he did not return to Weimar until June, 1788. His connection with Christiane Vulpius (died 1816), to whom he was married in 1806, began in this year. In 1789 his son August was born (died at Rome in 1830). Goethe was in Venice in 1790, and subsequently, on business of state, in Breslau. He was director of the ducal theater in Weimar in 1791, which position he held until 1817. In 1792 he accompanied the duke into the field against France, and was with him at the siege of Mainz in 1793. His close friendship with Schiller, which ended only with the death of the latter in 1805, began in 1794. After 1794 he devoted himself entirely to literature. Goethe's life in its literary phases may be considered under four periods. The first of these, the "first poetical period," covers the 1749 to 1775 residence in Frankfort in Weimar (1775). The chief works of this period are the plays "Die Laune des Verliebten" ("The Humor of the Lover"), "Die Mitschuldigen" ("The Accomplices"), both in Alexandrines; "Götz von Berlichingen," a tragedy which established his fame as a poet (1773); "Die Leiden des jungen Werthers" ("The Sorrows of Young Werther"), a novel (1774); "Clavigo," "Stella," both tragedies; poems to "Lili," and other lyrics; "Götter, Helden und Wieland" ("Gods, Heroes, and Wieland"), a satire (1774)—all belonging to the "Storm and Stress" period of German literature. The "second poetical period" extends from his arrival in Weimar to the beginning of his friendship with Schiller (from 1775 to 1794). It includes the operas "Erwin und Elmire" and "Claudine von Villa Bella" (1775; both rewritten in 1787), the first book of "Wilhelm Meister" (completed 1778), the final metrical version of "Iphigenie" (1787, on his return from Italy; it had been acted in 1779 in prose), "Die Geschwister" ("The Brother and Sister," 1787, a drama which had been written in 1776), "Egmont" (1787), "Torquato Tasso" (in verse, 1790; a prose version had been completed in 1781), "Reineke Fuchs," a poem (1793), and numerous shorter poems. The third period covers his friendship with schiller (from 1794 to 1805). It includes the "Römische Elegien" ("Roman Elegies," 1795), the famous metrical contest between Goethe and Schiller, "Xenien," or "Distichen" (1796; they appeared in Schiller's "Musenalmanach"), a series of satiric epigrams ("Distichen," written by Goethe and Schiller (1797), in the "Musenalmanach"), "Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahre" (1796), begun in 1775), "Hermann und Dorothea" (1797), "Die Natürliche Tochter" (1803, "Geschwister Fuchsbichler" ("History of the Doctrine of Color"), the final form 1810), "Die Braut von Korinth." The fourth is the period of his old age, from 1805 to 1832. It includes "Faust," the first part (1808), the Wahlverwandtschaften" ("Elective Affinities," 1809), "Aus meinem Leben, Dichtung und Wahrheit" ("Upon my Life: Poetry and Truth"; first part 1811, second 1812, third 1814; fourth 1831, and his scientific work. In 1814 he began to write the Oriental poems afterward published as "Das Westostliche Divan." In 1815 Spiridion Brwachin, a drama, was produced at Berlin in 1816. In 1816–17 he completed the first volume of the "Italianische Reise" ("Italian Journey"), followed in 1817 by a second, in 1829 by a third, their material having been written from 1786–88. Published in Weimar, among them Herder and Frau von Stein. He also began this year his treatises on Germanic art in the periodical "Kunst und Alterthum" ("Art and Antiquity"), which were continued down to 1828. In 1817 appeared the first of the series of essays on scientific subjects, "Zur Naturwissenschaft" ("On Natural History"), continued down to 1824. "Wilhelm Meister's Wanderjahre" appeared in 1821 (in its final shape in 1829). In 1821 was published the first part of the so-called "Zahme Xenien" ("Tame Xenien"), and a second in 1827. In 1828 the second part of "Faust" was completed, only a few months before his death. This last-mentioned work, the greatest of his productions, is in reality a life-long product of his life, since it had occupied him at times for nearly sixty years. In 1772 scenes of a prose "Faust" were written, fragments of which were retained in the later poetic version. The earliest rimed scenes of the first part are from 1773–75. In 1790 a first edition, with the title "Faust, ein Fragment," was published at Leipsic. About 1797 he again took up the first part, which was completed in 1806, and published at Tubingen in 1808. As regards the second part, the idea of the "Helena," ultimately printed as the third act of the completed second part, was first sketched before 1776. It was not, however, worked out until 1826, and in 1827 was published with the title "Helena, eine klassisch-romantische Phantasmagorie" ("Helena, a classic-romantic phantasmagoria"). The complete second part first appeared in the first volume of the "Nachgelassene Werke" ("Posthumous Works," 1833). His own editions of his collected works are "Schriften" (Leipsic, 1777–90, in 8 vols.); "Neue Schriften" (Berlin, 1792–1800, in 7 vols.); "Werke" (Tubingen, 1806–08, in 12 vols., with 4 vols. added at Cotta's fortieth in 1820); "Werke" (Stuttgart and Tubingen, 1815–19, in 20 vols.); "Werke" (1827–1831, in 40 vols.). To these are to be added "Goethe's nachgelassene Werke" (1832–34, in 15 vols., with 5 vols. more in 1842).

Golden Ass, The. [L. Metamorphoseon, seu de Asino Lucio, Libri XI.] A romance of a fantastic and satirical character, by Apuleius, written in the 2d century; probably his earliest work. It narrated a portion of the Metamorphoses of Lucian. The best-known episode in it is that of Cupid and Psyche, which was taken from a popular legend or myth. Some of the adventures of Don Quixote and of Gil Blas are drawn from this source, and Boccaccio has used many of the comic episodes. The author relates the tale in his own person. His dabbling in magic results in his transformation into an ass, in which form, however, he retains his human intelligence.

Its readers, on account of its excellence, as is generally supposed, added the epithet of "golden." Wieburton, however, conjectures, from the beginning of one of Pliny's epistles, that Aurea (or Golden) was the common title given to the Milesian and such tales as strolling mendicants tell for a piece of money to the rabble in a circle. Aesopus para et aequipondium fabulam dicere. Milesian fables were much in vogue in the age of Apuleius.

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 86.

In 1749 he obtained the degree of B. A. at Trinity College, Dublin. In 1752 he studied medicine at Edinburgh. He was extremely poor, and after a roving and not very creditable existence, both in England and on the Continent (the Continent from Feb., 1755, to Feb., 1756, traveling chiefly on foot), he returned in great destitution to London, where he tried to practise medicine. His unbearable appearance was against him, and he finally settled down as a literary hack. By 1759, however, he began to attract attention as a writer. He wrote for "The Critical Review," "The British Magazine," "The Lady's Magazine," "The Busybody," "The Bee," and other periodicals. Among his works are "Enquiry into the Present State of Polite Learning in Europe" (1759), "The Citizen of the World, etc." (1762; from the "Public Ledger," etc.), "A History of England, etc." (1764), "The Traveller" (1765), "The Vicar of Wakefield" (a tale, 1766), "The Good-natured Man" (comedy, 1768), "The Roman History, etc." (1769), "The Deserted Village" (a poem, 1770), "The History of England from the Earliest Times, etc." (1771; abridged 1774), "She Stoops to Conquer" (1773), "Retaliation" (a poem, 1774), "A History of the Earth and Animated Nature" (1774), "Little Goody Two Shoes" (a attribution to him, 1st translated Sept., 1765), "Roman History" (1769), and other French works, and with Joseph Collyer abridged Plutarch's "Lives" (1762).

Gondibert (gon′di-bėrt). A poem by Sir William Davenant, published in 1651.

"Gondibert," his [Sir William Davenant's] greatest performance, incurred, when first published, more ridicule and is at the present more neglect, than its merits deserve. An epic poem in elegiac stanzas must always be tedious, because no structure of verse is more unfavorable to narration than that which almost peremptorily requires each sentence to be restricted, or protracted to four lines. But the liveliness of Davenant's imagination, which Dryden has pointed out as his most striking attribute, has illuminated even the dull and dreary path which he has chosen: and perhaps few poems afford more instances of vigorous conceptions, and even felicity of expression, than the neglected "Gondibert."

Sir Walter Scott, Dryden, Works, III. 101.

Gorboduc (gôr'bō-dŭk). A mythical king of Britain. His story, with that of his sons Ferrex and Porrex, is told in the early chronicles.

Gorboduc, who succeeded to the crown of Britain soon after the death of Lear, profited so little by the example of his predecessor that he divided his dominions during his life between his two sons, Ferrex and Porrex, whose bloody history is the subject of the first regular English tragedy. It was written by Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville (Lord Buckhurst), was acted in 1561, and afterwards printed in 1565, under the name of "Gorboduc." Sir Philip Sidney says that this drama climbs to the height of Seneca, and Pope has pronounced the much higher praise that it possesses "an unaffected perspicuity of style and an easy flow in the numbers — in a word that chastity, correctness, and gravity of style which are essential to tragedy, and which all the tragic poets who followed, not excepting Shakspeare himself, either little understood or perpetually neglected." Both in the dramatic romance, the princes, between whom the kingdom had been divided, soon fell to dissension, and the younger stabbed the elder; the mother, whose mother's love did the like, having killed his brother in revenge, the people, indignant at the cruelty of the deed, rose in rebellion, and murdered both father and mother. The nobles then assembled and destroyed most of the rebels, but afterwards became embroiled in a civil war, in which they and their issue were all slain.

Gothia (gō'thi-ä). See Septimania.

Gothic (goth'ik). The language of the Goths. The Goths spoke various forms of a Teutonic tongue now usually classed with the Scandinavian as the eastern branch of the Teutonic family, though it has also close affinities with the western branch (Old High German, Anglo-Saxon, etc.). All forms of Gothic have perished without record, except that spoken by some of the western Goths (Visigoths), who at the beginning of the 4th century occupied Dacia (Wallachia, etc.), and who before the end of that century passed over in great numbers into Moesia (now Bulgaria, etc.). Revolting against the Roman Empire, they extended their conquests even into Gaul and Spain. Their language, now called Mœsogothic or simply Gothic, is preserved in the fragmentary remains of a nearly complete translation of the Bible made by their bishop, Wulfila (a name also used in the forms Ulfila, Ulphila, Ulfilas), who lived in the 4th century A. D., and in some other fragments. These remains are of a high philological importance, preceding by several centuries the next earliest Teutonic records (Anglo-Saxon and Old High German).

We do not know how much of the Bible Wulfila translated into Gothic. One ancient writer says that he translated all but the books of Kings, which he left out because he thought that the stories of Israel's wars would be dangerous reading for a people that was too fond of fighting already. It is quite in accordance with what we know of Wulfila's character that he should have felt some uneasiness as to the effect that such reading might have on the minds of his warlike countrymen; but one would have thought that the books of Joshua and Judges would have been even more likely to quench the Gothic passion for fighting than the books of Kings. Probably the truth is that Wulfila did not live to finish his translation, and no doubt he would leave to the last the books which he thought least important for his great purpose of making good Christians. The part of Wulfila's Bible that has come down to us consists of a considerable portion of each of the Gospels, and of each of St. Paul's Epistles, together with small fragments of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. Six different manuscripts have been found. The most important of these was discovered in the sixteenth century in a monastery at Werden in Germany. After having been in the possession of many different owners, it was bought in 1662 by the Swedish Count de la Gardie, who gave it the binding of solid silver from which it is commonly called Codex Argenteus, or Silver Book; it is now in the University of Upsala, and is regarded as one of the choicest treasures possessed by any library in Europe. It is beautifully written in letters of gold and silver on purple parchment, and contains the fragments of the Gospels. Of the other five manuscripts one was discovered in the seventeenth century in Germany, and the rest in Italy about seventy years ago.

Goths (goths). [See first quotation below.] An ancient Teutonic race which was established in the regions of the lower Danube in the 3d century. A probable hypothesis identifies them with the Gotones or Gutones who dwelt near the Baltic; but there is no reason to believe in their identification with the Getæ, and no proof of their Scandinavian origin. They made many inroads into different parts of the Roman Empire in the 3d and 4th centuries, and gradually accepted the Arian form of Christianity. The two great historical divisions were the Visigoths (West Goths, the Greutungi and the Ostrogoths (East Goths, the Thervingi). A body of Visigoths settled in the province of Moesia (the present Servia and Bulgaria), and were hence called Mœsogoths; and their apostle Wulfila (Ulfilas) translated the Scriptures into Gothic. Gothic The Visigoths formed a monarchy about 418, which existed in southern France until 507, and in Spain until 711. An Ostrogothic kingdom existed in Italy from the beginning of the 5th century to 555. The so-called Tetraxitic Goths are mentioned in the Crimea as late as the 18th century. By extension the name was applied to various other tribes which invaded the Roman Empire.

A fragment of a calendar contains the word Gut-thiuda, "people of the Goths." The word thiuda is the same as the Old English theód, meaning people; and from the compound Gut-thiuda, and from other evidence, it may be inferred that the name which, following the Romans, we spell as Goths was properly Gutans — in the singular Guta. Like all other names of nations, this word must originally have had a meaning, but it is very difficult to discover what that meaning was. It has often been asserted that the Goths called the Gothic something to do with the word God (in Gothic guth). We might easily believe that an ancient people might have chosen to call themselves "the people of God"; but that such a thought this interesting suggestion was proposed by Jacob Grimm, one of the greatest scholars who ever lived, it is now quite certain that it cannot be right. It is now to be generally thought that the meaning of Gutans is "the (nobly) born. Bradley, Story of the Goths, pp. 4, 5.

The Goths are always described as tall and athletic men, with fair complexion, blue eyes, and yellow hair — such people, in fact, as may be seen more frequently in Sweden than any other modern land. A very good idea of their national costume and their general appearance may be gained from the sculptures on "The Storied Column," as it is called, erected at Constantinople by the Emperor Arcadius in honour of his father Theodosius, which represents a triumphal procession including many Gothic captives. Bradley, Story of the Goths, p. 9.

Gotland (gōt'länd), or Gothland (goth'land), or Gottland (got'länd), or Gutaland (yö'tä-länd). An island of the Baltic, 60 miles east of Sweden, to which it belongs. The surface is generally level. Principal occupations are agriculture, cattle-raising, lime-burning, and quarrying. The chief place is Visby. The island was a medieval commercial center. It belonged at one time to the Hanseatic Order. In 1645 it was united to Sweden. Length, 70 miles. Area, 1,203 square miles. Population (1890), 51,337.

It is true that the southern province of Sweden is still called Gothland; but the Gautar (called Gestas by Anglo-Saxons, from whom this province took its name, were not identical with the Goths, though doubtless nearly related to them. On the other hand, the island called Gothland, in the Baltic, was anciently called Gutaland, which seems to show that its early inhabitants were really in the strict sense Goths; and, according to the Norse sagas and the Anglo-Saxon poets, the peninsula of Gutland was anciently occupied by a branch of the Gothic people, who were known as Hréth-gotan, or Reidhgotar.

Götterdämmerung (gēt'ter-dem'me-rōng). [G., 'twilight of the gods.'] The fourth part of Wagner's "Ring des Nibelungen," first performed at Bayreuth Aug. 17, 1876. Grove.

Gottfried von Strasburg (got'frēt fon sträs'bōrg). A Middle High German epic poet. He lived at the end of the 12th and the beginning of the 13th century, but the exact years of his birth and death are unknown. He belonged to the burgher class, as appears from the title "Meister" used in the MSS. About 1210 he wrote, after French originals, the epic poem "Tristan und Isolde," which, however, he did not live to complete. It was subsequently continued by Ulrich von Turheim (1233–1250) and Heinrich von Freiberg, who wrote about 1300.

Gottschalk (got'shälk), Latinized Gotescalcus (gō-tes-kal'kus). Died about 868. A German theologian. He was sent as a child to the convent of Fulda, and subsequently entered the Benedictine convent at Orbais, where he was ordained. His doctrine of twofold predestination (i. e. of some to eternal life and of others to eternal death) was condemned by the Synod of Mainz in 848, and he was deprived of his priestly functions. The rest of his life was spent in prison in the convent of Hautvilliers.

Gottschalk, Louis Moreau. Born at New Orleans, May 2, 1829: died near Rio de Janeiro, Dec. 18, 1869. A popular American pianist and composer, son of an Englishman and a Frenchwoman. He made extensive professional tours in Europe and in North and South America, and enjoyed great popularity.

Gottschall (got'shäl), Rudolph von. Born at Breslau, Prussia, Sept. 30, 1823. A German dramatist, poet, novelist, and miscellaneous writer. Among his works are "Die Gottin" (1853), "Carlo Zeno" (1855), "Deutsche Nationalliteratur" (1863), the plays "Pitt and Fox," "Katharina Howard," "Amy Robsart," etc.

Gottsched (got'shēd), Johann Christoph. Born at Judithen, near Königsberg, Feb. 2, 1700: died at Leipsic, Dec. 12, 1766. A German critic and writer. He was educated at Konigsberg, and subsequently went to Leipsic, where (1730) he was made professor of philosophy and poetry, and where he died. His services to German literature are principally critical. He was the reorganizer in Leipsic of the literary society, Die deutsche Gesellschaft, which afterward became a sort of academy. In 1725 he edited the journal "Die vernünftigen Tadlerinnen" ("The Rational Censors"), which was continued after 1727 under the title "Der Biedermann" ("The Honest Man"). A "Redekunst" ("Art of Rhetoric") appeared in 1728. His critical views were first systematically stated in "Versuche einer kritischen Dichtkunst fur die Deutschen" (1730). This was followed from 1732 to 1744 by a series of essays on literary topics called the Critische Beitrage. In 1734 appeared "Weltweisheit" ("World-Wisdom"), an exposition of the theories of Wolf, the leader of German rationalism. In 1740 appeared "Deutsche Sprachkunst." On the drama he exercised an important influence by his advocacy of French classicism. Through his efforts the first "Hanswurst" was banished from the German stage. His "Deutsche Schaubuhne" ("German Stage," 6 vols.) appeared 1740–45. His principal original poetical work is the tragedy "Der Sterbende Cato" ("The Dying Cato," 1732). From 1730 to 1740 he exercised a sort of literary dictatorship in Germany. After the latter date his influence rapidly declined. He became involved in a number of literary disputes, in which he was worsted. On the stage he was caricatured under the name "Tadler" ("Faultfinder"), and a witty lampoon held him up to ridicule.

Götz (gēts), Johann Nicolaus. Born at Worms, Germany, July 9, 1721: died at Winterberg, Nov. 4, 1781. A minor German poet. He studied theology at Halle 1739–42, and subsequently filled various ecclesiastical offices. He is noted for wit and elegance of expression rather than for depth of sentiment. His collected works, with a biography by Ramler, appeared at Mannheim in 1785 (new ed. 1807).

Götz of the Iron Hand. A name given to Götz von Berlichingen.

Götz von Berlichingen (gēts fon ber'lich-ing-en). A play by Goethe. The first sketch was finished in 1771. In 1773 he rewrote and published it. In 1804 he prepared another edition for the stage: it has not been played since. It is in the manner of a Shakesperian historical drama. See Berlichingen.

> "Goetz von Berlichingen," the subject of which was an old German baron of the time of Maximilian, grandfather to Charles V., who revoked the law of duel. Goetz, for contravening his ordinance in this, lost his right hand. A machine was made and fitted to his arm, whence he was called "iron hand." He was a real character, and has left memoirs of himself. The curious manner of a Shakesperian historical drama. See Berlichingen.

Gouda (gou'dä), or Ter-Gouw (ter-gou'), or Ter-Gouwe. A town in the province of South Holland, Netherlands, situated at the junction of the Gouwe and Yssel, 12 miles northeast of Rotterdam. It is noted for its bricks and pipes, and has large markets for cheese and other dairy products. The museum and the Groote Kerk are of interest. Population (1889), 16,674.

Goudimel (gō-dē-mel'), Claude. Born at Vaison, near Avignon, about 1510: killed at Lyons in the massacre on St. Bartholomew's day, Aug. 24, 1572. A noted French composer and teacher of music. He set to music some of the Psalms in their French version by Marot and Beza (1565).

Gough (gof), Alexander Dick. Born Nov. 3, 1804: died Sept. 8, 1871. An English architect and engineer. He devoted himself especially to ecclesiastical architecture.

Gough, Hugh, first Viscount Gough. Born at Woodstown, Limerick, Ireland, Nov. 3, 1779: died near Dublin, March 2, 1869. A British general. He was commander-in-chief in China 1841–42 and in India 1843–49, commanding in person in the Sikh wars 1845–46.

Gough, John Ballantine. Born at Sandgate, Kent, England, Aug. 22, 1817: died at Philadelphia, Feb. 18, 1886. A noted Anglo-American orator, distinguished particularly as a temperance lecturer in America and Great Britain. He came to the United States in 1829, and began lecturing in 1843. He visited England in 1853, 1857, and 1878. He published an "Autobiography" (1846), "Sunshine and Shadow" (1881), etc.

Goujet (gö-zhā'), Claude Pierre, Abbé. Born at Paris, Dec. 19, 1697: died at Paris, Feb. 1, 1767. A French historical and miscellaneous writer. His works include "Bibliothèque française, ou histoire litteraire de la France" (1740–59), "Bibliothèque des auteurs ecclésiastiques" (1736), "Origine et histoire de la poésie française, etc." (1745), etc.

Goujon (gö-zhôn'), Jean. Born about 1515 (?): killed at Paris, Aug. 24, 1572 (?). A celebrated sculptor of the French Renaissance period. Nothing is known definitely of his life. In 1540 he is mentioned as working on Saint-Maclou at Rouen; the little door of the church mentioned bears his name, and is from a later period. In 1541 he left Rouen for Paris, where he joined Pierre Lescot in the decoration of Saint-Germain-l'Auxerrois. From Paris he went to Rouen, where the architect Bullant was reconstructing the cathedral. The "Victory" of Écouen is well known. At about this time he is thought to have developed a tendency toward the Huguenot party. From 1547 to 1550 was his first period of work on the Louvre, then under reconstruction by Pierre Lescot. (See Louvre and Pierre Lescot.) To it belong the escalier (Galleries of Henri II., II.), figures of the celebrated beuf, the Caryatides du Louvre, and the figures of the Fontaine des Innocents. In 1550 Goujon went to Anet to work on the château of Diane de Poitiers, which was then building by Philibert de l'Orme. The Diane Chasseresse (traditionally representing the great Diana herself), which stood in the courtyard of the château, is now in the Louvre. Before 1560 he completed the decoration of the Louvre. After 1560–61 his name disappears from the list of "Maîtres Maçons" working with Pierre Lescot. He is supposed to have been shot on his return to the court of the Louvre during the massacre of St. Bartholomew (1572).

Goulburn (gōl'bėrn). A city in Argyle County, New South Wales, Australia, 105 miles southwest of Sydney. Population (1891), 10,916.

Gould (gōld), Augustus Addison. Born at New Ipswich, N. H., April 23, 1805: died at Boston, Sept. 15, 1866. An American naturalist, especially noted as a conchologist. Among his chief works are "Invertebrate Animals of Massachusetts" (1841), "Mollusca and Shells of the U. S. Exploring Expedition under Wilkes" (1852).

Gould, Baring. See Baring-Gould.

Gould, Benjamin Apthorp. Born at Boston, Sept. 27, 1824. A noted American astronomer. He was long employed in astronomical work in connection with the United States Coast Survey: was director of the Dudley Observatory at Albany, 1856–59; and from 1868 to 1885 had charge of the National Observatory at Cordoba, Argentina. This observatory was organized by him, and during his directorship it issued the most important series of astronomical reports that have appeared in South America. He founded and edited an astronomical journal at Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Gould, Hannah Flagg. Born at Lancaster, Mass., 1789: died at Newburyport, Mass., Sept. 5, 1865. An American poet. She removed with her parents in 1800 to Newburyport, where she spent the remainder of her life.

Gould, Jay. Born at Roxbury, Delaware County, N. Y., May 27, 1836: died at New York, Dec. 2, 1892. An American capitalist. He began life as a surveyor; became engaged in the lumber business; and about 1858 became connected with a bank in Stroudsburg, Pennsylvania. He subsequently became president of the Rutland and Washington Railroad, but soon resigned and went to New York, where he became president of the Erie Railway. His manipulation of this road in connection with James Fisk, Jr. (who was vice-president and treasurer), became notorious. He was obliged to restore to the Erie bondholders a securities account amounting to $7,650,000. He was later identified with the Western Union Telegraph Co., and with the extensive railroad combinations in the southwestern States known as the "Gould system." He left property valued at $72,000,000. See Black Friday.

Gould, John. Born at Lyme-Regis, Dorset, England, Sept. 14, 1804: died at London, Feb. 3, 1881. An English ornithologist. He began life as a gardener at Ripley Castle, Yorkshire, and became taxidermist to the London Zoological Society in 1827. He illustrated the "Century of Birds from the Himalayan Mountains," and published "Birds of Europe" (1832–37), "Birds of Australia" (1840–43), "Monograph of the Trochilidæ" (1849–61), "Birds of Great Britain" (1862–73), etc. He illustrated these works with nearly 3,000 plates.

Gounod (gö-nō'), Charles François. Born at Paris, June 17, 1818: died there, Oct. 18, 1893. A noted French composer. He entered the Conservatoire in 1836, took the second prix de Rome for his cantata "Marie Stuart et Rizzio" in 1837, and in 1839 took the grand prix for his cantata "Fernando." He at one time thought of entering the church. After some years of study he produced his "Messe Solennelle in G," some numbers of which were brought out by Hullah in London in 1851. From 1852 to 1860 he was conductor of the "Orphéon" in Paris. "Faust" was produced at the Théâtre Lyrique, March 19, 1859, and placed him at once in the first rank of his profession. Among his other operas are "Sapho" (1851), "Le médecin malgré lui" (from Molière's comedy (1858), "Philémon et Baucis" (1860), "La reine de Saba" (1862), "Mireille" (1864), "Roméo et Juliette" (1867), "Cinq-Mars" (1877), "Polyeucte" (1878), etc. He also wrote much church music, an oratorio "La rédemption," 1882), the religious work "Mors et vita" (1885), and many single songs and pieces, besides a great deal of music for the Orphéonistes.

Gour. See Gaur.

Gourgaud (gör-gō'), Baron Gaspard. Born at Versailles, France, Sept. 14, 1783: died at Paris, July 25, 1852. A French general. Govan (guv'an). A western suburb of Glasgow, Scotland.

Govardhana (gō-vär-dhā'nä). In Hindu mythology, a mountain in Vrindavana which Krishna induced the cowherds to worship instead of Indra. The god in rage sent a deluge to wash away the mountain and its people, but Krishna held up the mountain on his little finger to shelter the people, and Indra, baffled, did homage to Krishna.

Governor's Island. A small fortified island, belonging to the United States, situated in New York harbor about ½ mile south of New York.

Gow (gou), Nathaniel. Born at Inver, Perthshire, March 28, 1766: died at Edinburgh, Jan. 17, 1831. A Scotch violinist and composer.

Gow, or Gow (gou), Niel, Born at Inver, Perthshire, March 22, 1727: died there, March 1, 1807. A Scotch violinist and composer, father of Nathaniel Gow. He was the author of several popular Scotch airs.

Gower (gou'ėr). 1. A character in Shakspere's "Henry IV.," part 2, and in "Henry V.": an officer in the king's army.—2. In Shakspere's "Pericles," a character who appears as chorus.

Gower, John, born about 1325: died in the priory of St. Mary Overies, Southwark, 1408. An English poet. Little is known of his early life, but he appears to have lived in Kent and to have been a man of wide reading. He was well known at court in his later years. His principal work, the "Confessio Amantis" (written in English, probably in 1386), was originally dedicated to Richard II., but in 1399 he changed the dedication to Henry of Lancaster (afterward Henry IV.). Caxton printed it in 1483. Among his other works are "Speculum Meditantis" (written in French, probably lost) and "Vox Clamantis" (a poem written in Latin, begun in 1383). After the accession of Henry VI., Gower, then an old man, added a supplement, the "Tripartite Council." It treats of occurrences of the time, and the strength of its separations and teaching caused Chaucer to call him "the moral Gower." "Balades" and other poems (mostly in French) were printed in 1818.

Gower. A peninsula in Glamorganshire, Wales, which projects into Bristol Channel. The majority of the inhabitants are of Flemish or Norman origin.

Gowrie (gou'ri), Carse of. A low-lying tract of fertile land in Perthshire, Scotland, extending along the north bank of the Tay, for about 15 miles, between Perth and Dundee.

Gowrie Conspiracy. A conspiracy against the life or personal freedom of James VI. of Scotland, by John Ruthven, earl of Gowrie, Alexander Ruthven, and others. It resulted in the death of the leaders in a struggle with the king's followers at Perth, Aug. 5, 1600.

Goya (gō'yä). A town in the province of Corrientes, Argentine Republic, situated near the Paraná about lat. 29° 10′ S., long. 59° 20′ W. Population, about 4,000.

Goyanás (gō-ya-näs'). A race of Indians formerly occupying the Brazilian coast between Angra dos Reis and the island of Cananea, and, inland, the country about the present city of São Paulo. They lived in the open lands, were savages of a low grade, subsisted by hunting and fishing, and practised little or no agriculture: commonly they dwelt in caves. The Goyanás were enemies of the Tupi hordes, but readily made friends with the whites, and were among the first to whom Anchieta and Nobrega preached. The Goyatacás (which see) appear to have been of the same race. It has been supposed that the Camés and other mixed tribes are partly derived from them. Also written Guayanás, Guayanazes, and (by a double plural) Guayanazes or Guayanases.

Goyanna (go-yän'na). A town in the state of Pernambuco, Brazil, situated on the river Goyanna, near the sea, about 50 miles north of Recife. Population, about 5,000.

Goyás (go-yäs'). An extinct tribe of Brazilian Indians who lived in the region between the Tocantins and Araguaya. Their women were gold ornaments, which led the first Portuguese explorers to the discovery of rich gold-mines. The city and subsequently the captaincy-general of Goyaz were named from them. Also written Guayás, and (a double plural) Goyazes or Guayases.

Goyatacá (gō-yä-tä-kä'), or Goyotacá (gō-yō-tä-kä'). A sub-stock of the Tapuya race of Brazilian Indians: so called by Martius because he believed that the ancient Goyatacás were of the same group. It includes the Caropos, Macunis, Patachos, and other hordes in northeastern Minas Geraes, southern Bahia, and Espirito Santo.

Goyatacás (gō-yä-tä-käs'). [So called by the Tupis, from guatá, to run, and cá, to be: 'runners.'] A tribe of Brazilian Indians which, at the time of the conquest, occupied the open lands near the coast in what is now the eastern part of the state of Rio de Janeiro. They were wandering savages in canoes, and apparently in language allied to the Goyanás (which see). For many years they were dangerous enemies of the whites. Also written Goyatacazes, Goaitacazes, and (a double plural) Goaitacazes, Goyatacases, and Goitacazes. Campos dos Goitacazes, abbreviated to Campos, the name of a city.

Goya y Lucientes (gō'yä ē lō-thē-en'tes), Francisco. Born at Fuendetodos, near Saragossa, Spain, March 31, 1746: died at Bordeaux, France, March 16, 1828. A noted Spanish painter and etcher. Among his works are portraits, satirical works, representations of bull-fights, etc. He is also known as a caricaturist and satirist. He has been called "the Hogarth of Spain."

Goyaz (gō-yäz'). 1. A state of Brazil, lying east of Matto Grosso and north of Minas Geraes. Area, 288,546 square miles. Population (1888), 211,721.—2. The capital of the state of Goyaz, situated on the river Vermelho in lat. 16° 26′ S., long. 49° 49′ W.: formerly called Villa Boa de Goyaz. Population, about 8,000.

Goyeneche (gō-yā-nā'chā), José Manuel. Born at Arequipa, Peru, June 15, 1775: died at Madrid, Spain, Oct. 15, 1846. For many years general and consul of Guaqui; and later was councilor of state, senator, and commander in several provinces. In 1846 he was made a grandee of Spain.

Gozan (gō'zan). In biblical geography, a district and city in northern Mesopotamia, mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions.

Gozlan (goz-lon'), Léon. Born at Marseilles, Sept. 1, 1803: died at Paris, Sept. 14, 1866. A French novelist and dramatist. He wrote "Le notaire de Chantilly" (1836), "Le médecin du Pecq" (1839), "Le dragon rouge" (1843). "Histoire de cent trente femmes" (1853), "Balzac en pantoufles" (1856: a familiar memoir of great interest, Gozlan having been Balzac's secretary), and "La folle du N° 16" (1861) and "Le vampire du Val-de-Grâce" (1862), two pseudo-medical studies, besides many other tales, and about 15 plays, which were not so successful as his novels.

Gozo, or Gozzo (got'so). An island in the Mediterranean Sea, belonging to Great Britain, 4 miles northwest of Malta: the ancient Gaulos. Area, 20 square miles. Population (1891), 18,921.

Gozzi (got'se), Count Carlo, Born at Venice, Dec. 13, 1720: died April 6, 1806. An Italian dramatist and satirist.

With Gozzi it had likewise the effect of leading to a new style of comedy, by the introduction of those fairy dramas which had such an astounding run, during several years, at Venice, and which are now completely forgotten, except indeed by the Germans who, on their revival, conferred upon Count Gozzi the title of the first comic writer of Italy. Simonde, Lit. of the South of Europe, I. 532.

Gozzi, Count Gasparo. Born at Venice, Dec., 1713; died at Padua, Italy, Dec. 26, 1786. An Italian critic and littérateur, brother of Carlo Gozzi. He wrote "Osservatore veneto periodico" (1768), etc.

Gozzo. See Gozo.

Gozzoli (got'so-lē). Benozzo. Born at Florence, 1420; died at Pisa, 1498. A Tuscan painter. His chief work is the mural paintings in the Campo Santo, Pisa.

Graaf (gräf), Regnier de. Born at Schoonhoven, Netherlands, July 30, 1641; died at Delft, Netherlands, Aug. 17, 1673. A physician and anatomist, author of works upon the pancreas, the generative organs, etc. His works include "De natura et usu succi pancreatici" (1663), "De nonnullis circa partes genitales inventis novis" (1668), "Tractatus de virorum organis generationi inservientibus, etc." (1668), "De mulierum organis generationi inservientibus, etc." (1672), etc. The Graafian follicles were named from him.

Graaf Reinet (gräf ri'net). The chief town of the Midland Province of Cape Colony, on Sundays River, 94 miles from Port Elizabeth. Population (1891), 5,946.

Graal, The Holy. See Grail.

Grabbe (grāb'be). Christian Dietrich. Born at Detmold, Germany, Dec. 11, 1801: died there, Sept. 12, 1836. A German dramatist, author of "Don Juan und Faust" (1829), "Friedrich Barbarossa" and "Heinrich VI." (1829–30), etc.

Grabow-an-the-Oder (grā'bov-an-thē-ō'der). A town in the province of Pomerania, Prussia, situated on the Oder 2 miles north of Stettin. Population (1890), 15,703.

Gracchus (grak'us). Caius Sempronius. Killed at Rome, 121 B. C. A Roman politician, younger brother of the younger Tiberius Graechus. He served under his brother-in-law scipio Africanus Minor in Spain, and was questor in Sardinia 126–123, when he was elected tribune of the people. He renewed the agrarian law passed by his brother Tiberius, and brought forward a series of resolutions leading to the substitution of a pure democracy for the existing aristocratic republican form of government, securing the support of the proletarii of the capital by the regular distribution of grain at the expense of the state. He was reelected to the tribuneship in 122, but failed of election in 121, in consequence of the opposition among all classes to his project of extending the rights of citizenship to the Latins. He was killed in a disturbance which ensued in the city.

Gracchus, Tiberius Sempronius. Born about 210 B. C.: died middle of 2d century B. C. A Roman magistrate, distinguished as a general in Spain and Sardinia, father of Tiberius and Caius Gracchus.

Gracchus, Tiberius Sempronius. Born in 168 or 163: died 133 B. C. A celebrated Roman politician, son of Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus and Cornelia, daughter of Scipio Africanus Major. He married Claudia, daughter of Appius Claudius, and was the brother-in-law of Scipio Africanus Minor, whom he accompanied in his expedition against Carthage. He was appointed questor in 137, and as such served under the consul C. Hostilius Mancina in the Numantine war in Spain. He was elected tribune of the people for 133. At this period the class of independent farmers of small holdings was rapidly disappearing from Italy. The land was being absorbed by the latifundia of the rich, and cultivated by slave labor; and the peasantry were forced to seek refuge in the cities, especially Rome, where they swelled the ranks of the unemployed. Gracchus sought to bring about a greater subdivision of the land and to restore the class of independent farmers by reviving, with some modification, the Licinian law, passed in 367 but allowed to fall into abeyance, which limited the amount of public land that each citizen might occupy. His proposals were carried in the curiatia tribuna in spite of the opposition of his colleague, who was deposed. At the end of his term he tried, contrary to the constitution, to secure reelection, and a disturbance arose in consequence, in which he was killed with 300 of his followers by the optimates under P. Scipio Nasica.

Grace (grās). William Gilbert. Born July 18, 1848. An English cricketer. He is especially distinguished as a batsman, but has the reputation of being the best all-round player hitherto known. By profession he is a physician.

Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners. An autobiographical work by Bunyan, published in 1666.

Grace Contract, The. The name given to an arrangement made between the government of Peru and the foreign holders of bonds of that nation, represented by Mr. Michael Grace. It was ratified by the Peruvian congress Oct. 25, 1889, and provided that the bonds, amounting to about $250,000,000, should be canceled. The bondholders received in return all the state railroads for 66 years, and important provinces connected with them, for which all the guano in Peru up to 3,000,000 tons, except that on the Chincha Islands; the government also promised to pay the bondholders 80,000 pounds sterling annually for 30 years. The bondholders agreed to complete certain unfinished railroads and to repair the existing ones within a given time. The "Peruvian Corporation," formed to take charge of the railroads, etc., also took possession of the Cerro de Pasco silver-mines, transferred to it by Mr. Grace, who had received the concession.

Graces, The Three. [Gr. Χάριτες, pl. of Χάρις = L. Gratia, E. Grace.] In classical mythology, personifications of grace and beauty, daughters of Zeus by Hera (or Eunome, or Eumonia, etc.), or of Apollo by Ægle (or Euanthe). The names generally given to them are Euphrosyne, Aglaia, and Thalia. In Sparta and in Athens only two Graces were recognized.

Graces, The Three. An antique undraped marble group preserved in the Opera del Duomo at Siena, Italy. It is the foundation of many of the Renaissance and modern representations of the subject.

Gracian (grā-thē-än'), Baltasar. Born at Calatayud, Spain, about 1584: died at Tarragona, 1658. A Spanish Jesuit preacher and man of letters, head of the College of Tarragona. He is noted chiefly as a supporter of "Gongorism," or the so-called "polished style." See Góngora.

Gracias, or Gracias á Dios (grā'thē-äs á dē-ōs'). [Sp., 'thanks to God.'] A town in Honduras, Central America, 76 miles west of Comayagua. It was founded in 1536, and was the first seat of the Audience of the Confines, and hence the capital of Central America, 1543–48. Population, about 4,000.

Gracioso (grā-thē-ō'sō). A popular addition made by Lope de Vega to the stock characters of Spanish comedy. He was a comic character, sometimes half buffoon, like the "fantastical person" of the contemporary English stage. Not seldom, and especially in Moreto's Desden, he is at the very core of the play. Morley, The Playgoer, p. 325.

Gradgrind (grad'grind), Thomas. A retired merchant in Dickens's "Hard Times." He is "a man of facts and calculations," in his own words, and is so practical that he is hardly human. "Now, what I want is facts. Teach these boys and girls nothing but facts. Facts alone are wanted in life. Plant nothing else, and root out everything else. You can only form the minds of reasoning animals upon facts: nothing else will ever be of any service to them. This is the principle on which I bring up these children. Stick to facts, sir!"

Gradiska, or Gradisca (grā-dis'kä). A town in the crownland of Görz and Gradiska, Austria-Hungary, situated on the Isonzo 22 miles northwest of Triest. The principality was finally united to the Austrian house in 1717. Population (1880), commune, 3,352.

Gradus ad Parnassum (grā'dus ad pär-nas'um). [L., 'steps to Parnassus.'] 1. A Greek or Latin dictionary which indicates the quantities of vowels: used as a guide in exercises of verse composition.—2. A Latin work on composition with counterpoint, by Johann Joseph Fux (1725).—3. A French work on the art of pianoforte-playing, with 100 studies, by Clementi, finished in 1817.

Grafton, Dukes of. See Fitzroy.

Grafton, Richard. Died about 1572. An English chronicler, printer to Edward VI. both before and after his accession to the throne. See the extract.

> In 1537 Grafton, in association with a fellow-merchant, Edward Whitchurch, caused a modification of Coverdale's translation to be printed, probably by Jacob van Meteren, at Antwerp. The title-page assigned the translation to Thomas Matthews, who signed the dedication to Henry VIII., and it is usually known as Matthews's Bible. But Matthews was the pseudonym of John Rogers, the editor. No printer's name nor place is given in the book itself. . . . In November, 1538, Coverdale's corrected English translation of the New Testament, with the Latin text, was "prynted in Paris by Francys Regnault . . . for Richard Grafton and Edward Whitchurch, cytezens of London," with a dedication to Cromwell. This is the earliest book bearing Grafton's name. Grafton and Whitchurch chiefly concentrated their attention on the folio Bible, known as "the Great Bible." A license to print the book in Paris had been obtained at Henry VIII.'s request from Francis I. . . . An order was issued by the French government, 13 Dec. 1538, stopping the work and forfeiting the presses and type. Grafton escaped hastily to England. Many printed sheets were destroyed by the French authorities, but the presses and the types were afterwards purchased by Cromwell and brought to England. There the work was completed and published in April, 1539. Grafton was the printer of the first Book of Common Prayer in 1549, and of the edition of 1552. In 1552 and 1553 he printed "Actes of Parliament." Dict. Nat. Biog.

Gragas (grä'gäs). [ON. Grágás: grá, gray, and gás, goose.] The name given to several private compilations of the ancient Icelandic law and canon, under the commonwealth. There are two principal collections that bear the title, the Konungsbok (Icel. Konungsbók) and the Stadarholsbok (Icel. Stadarholsbók), both from the 13th century. The name was probably applied to offset the Norwegian Gulfjödnir, 'gold feather,' used of the old code of the Frostu-thing.

Gragnano (grän-yä'nō). A town in the province of Naples, Italy, 17 miles southeast of Naples. Population (1881), 8,611.

Graham (grām), James, fifth Earl and first Marquis of Montrose. Born in 1612: died May 21, 1650. A noted Scottish statesman and soldier. He served in the Presbyterian army at the beginning of the civil war, but afterward joined the king, by whom he was made lieutenant-general in Scotland in 1644. He defeated the Covenanters at Tippermuir Sept. 1, and at Aberdeen Sept. 13, 1644, and at Inverlochy Feb. 2, Auldearn May 9, Alford July 2, and Kilsyth Aug. 15, 1645. He was defeated by David Leslie at Philiphaugh, Sept. 13, 1645, and expelled from Scotland. He afterward entered the service of Charles II., and, on the restoration, by whom he was made a field-marshal. In 1650 he conducted an abortive Royalist descent on Scotland, and was captured and executed.

Graham, James, second Marquis of Montrose: surnamed "The Good." Born about 1631: died Feb., 1669. A Scotch nobleman, second son of James, first Marquis of Montrose.

Graham, Sir James Robert George. Born at Naworth, Cumberland, June 1, 1792: died at Netherby, Cumberland, Oct. 25, 1861. A British statesman. He was first lord of the admiralty 1830–34, home secretary 1841–46, and first lord of the admiralty 1852–55.

Graham, John, of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee. Born about 1649: died July 17 or 18, 1689. A Scottish soldier. He served in the Dutch army under the Prince of Orange, returning to Scotland in 1677. In 1678 he was appointed captain of a troop of dragoons, and was ordered to enforce certain stringent laws that had been enacted against the Scottish Covenanters. The severity with which he executed his orders provoked rioting, and the Covenanters defeated him at Drumclog June 1, 1679. In 1689 Claverhouse raised a body of Highlanders to fight for James II. against William III., and July 17, 1689, gained the battle of Killiecrankie, but fell mortally wounded

Graian Alps (grā'an alps). A group of mountains on the borders of Savoy (France) and Piedmont (Italy), lying between the Cottian Alps on the south and the Pennine Alps on the north. The highest summit is the Gran Paradiso (13,293 feet).

Grail, or Graal (grāl). In medieval legend, a cup or chalice (called more particularly the holy grail, or sangreal), supposed to have been of emerald, used by Christ at the Last Supper. In this vessel Joseph of Arimathea caught the last drops of Christ's blood as he was taken from the cross. By Joseph, according to one account, it was carried to Britain; other accounts affirm that it was brought by angels from heaven and intrusted to a body of knights, who guarded it on the top of a mountain: when approached by any one not perfectly pure, it vanished from sight. The grail having been lost, it became the great object of search or quest to knights errant of all nations, none being qualified to discover it but a knight perfectly chaste in thought and act. The stories and poems concerning Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table are founded on this legend, and it has been still further developed in modern times. In the "Parsifal" of Wolfram of Eschenbach the grail is a precious stone confided by angels to the care of a religious brotherhood, "The Chevaliers of the Grail."

The probable genesis of the Arthurian legend, in so far as it concerns French literature, appears to be as follows. First in order of composition, and also in order of thought, comes the Legend of Joseph of Arimathea, sometimes called the "Little St. Graal." This we have both in verse and prose, and one or both of these versions is the work of Robert de Borron, a knight and trouvère possessed of lands in the Gatinais. There is nothing in this work which is directly connected with Arthur. By some it has been attributed to Latin, but not now probably, a "Book of the Graal," by others to Byzantine originals. Anyhow it fell into the hands of the well-known Walter Map, and his exhaustless energy and invention at once seized upon it. He produced the "Great St. Graal," a very much extended version of the early history of the sacred vase, still keeping clear of definite connection with Arthur, though familiar in that direction. From this, in its turn, sprang the original form or "Percevale," which represents a quest for the vessel by a knight who has not originally anything to do with the Round Table. The link of connection between the two stories is to be found in the "Merlin," attributed also to Robert de Borron, wherein the Welsh legends begin to have more definite influence.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 35.

Grain Coast (grān kōst). That part of the coast of Liberia, western Africa, which extends from about long. 8° to 11° W.: so called from the exportation thence of grains of paradise.

Grainger (grān'jėr), James. Born probably at Duns, Berwickshire, in 1721 (?): died at St. Christopher, West Indies, Dec. 16, 1766. A Scottish physician and poet. After 1758 he settled in London, where he became intimate with Johnson and other famous men. In 1759 he went to the West Indies. He published a number of works, including essays, etc., on medicine. Among his poems are an "Ode on Solitude" (in Dodsley's collection, 1755), and "The Sugar Cane" (1764). He translated part of Ovid's "Epistles" (1758), and the "Elegies of Tibullus" and the poems of Sulpicia (1759). He assisted, with others, Charlotte Lenox in her translation of Brumoy's "Théâtre des Grecs" (1759).

Gran. A river in Hungary which joins the Danube opposite Gran. Length, 160 miles.

Granada (gra-nä'dä; Sp. pron. grä-nä'thä). A former kingdom of Spain, comprising the three modern provinces of Almeria, Granada, and Malaga. It belonged to the caliphate of Cordova, and after the fall of Cordova it became in 1238 an independent kingdom — vassal, however, of Castile. A long war with Ferdinand and Isabella ended in 1492 with the capture of Granada, the last of the Moorish power in Spain.

Granada. A province in southern Spain, bounded by Cordova, Jaen, and Albacete on the north, Murcia and Almeria on the east, Almeria and the Mediterranean on the south, and Malaga on the west. It is traversed by the Sierra Nevada. Area, 4,937 square miles. Population (1887), 484,341.

Granada, Moorish Karnattah. The capital of the province of Granada, Spain, situated on the Jenil, on spurs of the Sierra Nevada, in lat. 37° 13′ N., long. 3° 41′ W. It is famous for the Alhambra (which see). The Generalife is a Moorish royal villa with extensive and lovely gardens, higher up the hill than the Alhambra. The graceful arcades and delicate arabesques are Alhambraic, as is the arrangement in the chief court of the tank to reflect the flowers and the perspective of arches. The cathedral Early Classical style, with lofty Pointed vaulting, was finished in 1549. The interior is spacious and well proportioned. The north door, the Puerta del Perdon, is a good example of ornate Renaissance design. The Capilla Real, south of the cathedral, was built before it, as a mausoleum for Ferdinand and Isabella, in the florid-Pointed style of their reign. It has a superb sculptured retable, the sides of which are panellable kneeling portrait-statues of Ferdinand and Isabella. Their tomb (the tomb of the "Catholic kings") is an altar-tomb in marble, perhaps the most beautiful in the world, richly yet soberly decorated with figures sculptured arabesques, and with four griffins at the angles. The fine recumbent figures of the king and queen are clad in their royal robes. Beside this tomb is that, similar but even more elaborately ornamented, of their daughter Juana and her husband Philip. The details are admirable, but the monument is overloaded. The work is Italian. Granada was a large and powerful Moorish city, the capital of the kingdom of Granada. It was besieged and taken by the Spaniards in 1492. Population (1887), 73,006.

He matriculated at Christ Church, Oxford, in 1743, but took no degree. He took holy orders, and was presented to the College of Shiplake. About 1753 he made a tour through Holland. He wrote "A Biographical History of England . . . with a preface showing the utility of a collection of engraved portraits, etc." (1769). This was continued with additions at different times till in 1824 the work had increased to 6 volumes. In 1806 another continuation appeared from materials left by Granger and the collections of the Rev. Mark Noble, who says that the wholesale destruction of illustrated biographical works necessary to accomplish this gave rise to the term grangerize.

Previously to the publication of the first edition of Granger's work in 1769, five shillings was considered a liberal price by collectors for any English portrait. After the appearance of the "Biographical History," books ornamented with engravings rose in price to five times their original value, and few could be found unmutilated. In 1866 Joseph Lilly and Joseph Willis, booksellers, each offered for sale an magnificent illustrated copy of Granger's work. Lilly's copy, which included Noble's "continuation," was illustrated by more than thirteen hundred portraits, bound in 27 vols. imperial 4to, price £42. The price of Willis's copy, which contained more than three thousand portraits, bound in 19 vols. fol., was £38 10s. It had cost the former owner nearly £200. The following collections have been published in illustration of Granger's work: (a) "Portraits illustrating Granger's Biographical History of England" (known under the name of "Richardson's Collection"), 8 pts. Lond. 1792–1812, 4to. (b) Samuel Woodburn's "Gallery of [over two hundred] Portraits . . . illustrative of Granger's Biographical History of England, etc." Lond. 1816, fol. (c) "A Collection of Portraits to illustrate Granger's Biographical History of England and Noble's continuation to Granger, forming a Supplement to Richardson's Copies of rare Granger Portraits," 2 vols. Lond. 1820–3, fol. Dict. Archæol.

The "Scala-chronica" opens with an allegorical prologue, and is divided into five parts. The first part, which relates the fabulous history of Britain, is based on "Walter of Exeter's" Brut (i. e. on Geoffrey of Monmouth); part ii., which reaches to Edgar's accession, is based upon Bede; part iii., extending to William the Conqueror, on Hizden's "Polychronicon"; and part iv. professes to be founded on "John le Vieir & Thomath qui escript le Vie dña Anna." There are several difficulties connected with the prologue; the chief are its distinct allusions to Thomas Otterburn, who is generally supposed to have written early in the next century (Scots chron. pp. 1-4). According to Mr. Stevenson many incidents, in part iv. are not to be found in the current editions of Higden. Mr. Stevenson considers the book to assume some independent value with the reign of John; but its true importance really begins with the reign of Edward I. It is especially useful for the Scottish wars, and narrates the exploits of the author's father in great detail (Scala-chron. pp. 125, 127, 158, etc.). The attire is tolerably minute as to Edward II.'s reign (pp. 136-55), and the rest of the book (pp. 155-203) is devoted to Edward III. The earliest account of the French wars from 1355-61 suggests the presence of the writer (pp. 172-200). The history breaks off in 1362 or 1363. Dict. Nat. Biog., XXIII. 21.

Gray, Thomas. Born at London, Dec. 26, 1716; died at Cambridge, July 30, 1771. An English poet. He was sent to Eton as an oppidan in 1727, forming an intimate friendship with Horace Walpole. Great Synagogue, The. See the extract.

Accordingly we find that a new form of the theory started up in the sixteenth century, and gained almost undisputed currency in the Protestant churches. According to this view, the Canon was compiled by a body of men known as the Great Synagogue. The Great Synagogue plays a considerable part in Jewish tradition; it is represented as a permanent council, under the presidency of Ezra, wielding supreme authority over the Jewish nation; and a variety of functions are ascribed to it. But the tradition never said that the Great Synagogue fixed the Canon. That theory, current as it now is, is a mere conjecture of Elias Levita, a Jewish scholar contemporary with Luther. Not only so, but we now know that the whole idea that they called the Great Synagogue holding rule in the Jewish nation is pure fiction. It has been proved in the clearest manner that the origin of the legend of the Great Synagogue lies in the account given in Neh. viii.-x. of the great convocation which met at Jerusalem and subscribed the covenants to observe the law.

Greece (grēs). [ME. Grece, from OF. Grece, F. Grèce, Sp. Pg. It. Grecia, from L. Graecia (whence Gr. Γραικία), from Graecus, Greek, from Gr. Γραικός, pl. Γραικοί, orig. applied to the inhabitants of Epirus, etc. The common Greek name for the country was Hellas, Ἑλλάς; for the inhabitants Hellenes, Ἕλληνες. The AS. name was Créca land, Grécland, Grécland, D. Griekenland, G. Griechenland, land of the Greeks.] A country in southeastern Europe—(a) Ancient Greece, the country of the Hellenes. In the widest sense the name includes the Greek colonies in Asia Minor, Sicily, Africa, etc.; in its restricted and more usual meaning it is the peninsula south of the Cambunian Mountains, with the neighboring islands. Politically Greece comprised Thessaly, Epirus, central Greece (including Acarnania, Etolia, Doris, Western Locris, Eastern Locris, Phocis, Boeotia, Attica, and Megaris), and Peloponnesus (including Corinthia, Sicyonia, Phliasia, Achaia, Elis, Arcadia, Argolis, Laconia, and Messenia). The chief islands were Eubœa, Rhodes, Samos, Chios, Lesbos, Tenedos, Imbros, Samothrace, Thasos, Lemnos, Scyros, Eubœa, Salamis, Ægina, the Cyclades, Thera, Cythera, and the Ionian Islands (including Zacynthos, Cephallenia, Ithaca, Leucas, Corcyra, and Paxos). Macedonia sometimes included, and in later times Macedonia and Thrace. The surface is mostly mountainous. The following are some of the more important dates and incidents of ancient Greek history: Dorian invasion of the Peloponnesus about 1100 B. C.; commencement of the hegemony of Sparta 6th century; Persian wars, 500 to about 449; hegemony transferred to Athens about 477; Peloponnesian war 431–404; hegemony of Sparta 404–371; of Thebes 371–362; hegemony of Macedon commenced 338; rise of Ætolian League and renewal of Achæan League about 280; independence of Greece proclaimed by Flamininus 196; final subjection of Greece to Rome 146; Greece made (in great part) into the Roman province Achaia 27 B. C. Greece formed part of the Eastern Empire. (See further below, and under the various cities: also Persian Wars and Peloponnesian War. (b) Modern Greece; a kingdom, capital Athens, which has been the Turkish empire on the north, and the sea on the east, south, and west, and including the Ionian Islands, Eubœa, the Cyclades, and some smaller islands. It includes the ancient Peloponnesus, Central Greece, southeastern Epirus, and nearly all Thessaly; and contains 16 nomarchies: Attica and Boeotia, Eubœa and the Sporades, Phthiotis and Phocis, Acarnania and Ætolia, Achaia and Elis, Arcadia, Laconia, Messenia, Argolis and Corinth, the Cyclades, Corfu, Cephallenia, Zante, Thessaly, Arta, and Larissa. The government is a hereditary constitutional monarchy, with a chamber of deputies (207 members). The prevailing religion is that of the Greek Church. The inhabitants are chiefly Greeks (with some Albanians and Wallachians). In the later middle ages Greece was subject to the Venetians and other foreign rulers; it was conquered by Turkey in 1687–99, and reconquered by the Turks in 1715. More recent events are the revolution of 1821–28; the establishment of a kingdom in 1832; the revolution of 1843; the grant of a constitution in 1844; the revolution and the consequent deposition of Otto in 1862; the election of George I. in 1863; and the cession of Arta, Tricala, and Larissa by Turkey in 1881. Area, 25,041 square miles. Population (1889), 2,187,208.

Greek Empire. See Eastern Empire.

Greek Independence, War of. The Greek revolts against the Turks, which broke out in the Morea, and in Wallachia and Moldavia, in 1821. The war was noteworthy for the Greek exploits by sea, the aid rendered by Lord Byron and other Philhellenes, the Turkish atrocities in Chios, the interference of the powers and their victory over the Turkish fleet at Navarino in 1827, and the treaty with Turkish war of 1828–29, which secured the independence of Greece.

He was educated at Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he took his master's degree in 1583. He was subsequently incorporated at Oxford. After leaving the university he seems to have led a dissolute life abroad for some time. In 1592, after 10 years of reckless living and hasty literary production, he died after "a debauch of pickled herrings and Rhenish, described by all his friends. Gabriel Harvey attacked him shortly after his death in "Four Letters and Certain Sonnets," etc. Meres, Nashe, Nashe's and others defended him, and Nashe, who had also been attacked, published his "Strange News," directed more against Harvey than in defense of Greene. The quarrel was prolonged. Greene's fame rests mostly on the songs and eclogues which are interspersed through his prose works. His principal works are tracts and pamphlets: "Mamillia," etc. (entered on "Stationers' Register" 1580, "Gwydonius, the Carde of Fancie" (1584), "Arbasto, the Anatomie of Fortune" (1584), "Planetomachia" (1585), "Menaphon" (1587), "Perimedes the Blacke-Smith" (1588), "Pandosto: the Triumph of Time, the hystorie of Dorastus and Fawnia" (1588), "Alcida" (licensed 1588), "Mamillia, etc." (1589), "Euphues his Censure to Philautus" (in 1589), "Greene's Mourning Garment, etc." (1590), "Greene's Never too Late" (1590), "Greene's Farewell to Folly" (1591), "A Notable Discovery of Cozenage" (in 3 parts: 1591–92, the third in 1592), "Greene's Groatsworth of Wit, etc." (published at his dying request: licensed 1592). His plays are "Orlando Furioso," "A Looking-Glass for London and England" (with Lodge), "The Honourable History of Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay," "James the Fourth," "Alphonsus, King of Aragon," and "George-a-Greene, the Pinner of Wakefield." He was collected and edited his works 1831–58.

Gregory (greg'ō-ri), Saint, surnamed "The Illuminator" (in Armenia called Gregor Lusavoritch). [ME. Gregoric, F. Grégoire, It. Sp. Pg. Gregorio, G. Gregorius, Gregor, L. Gregorius, from Gr. Γρηγόριος, lit. 'watchful.'] Born at Valarshabad, Armenia, about 257; died 332. The founder and patron saint of the Armenian Church. He was consecrated patriarch of Armenia about 302.

Gregory I., Saint, surnamed "The Great." Born at Rome about 540; died there, March 12, 604. Pope 590-604. He was descended from an illustrious Roman family, probably the Anicians; studied dialectics, belles-lettres, and civil law; served the city as prefect in 574 was appointed pretor urbanus by the emperor Justin. Retiring from this office in order to consecrate himself to an ecclesiastical life, he employed the wealth left him at his father's death to establish six monasteries in Sicily and one at Rome, and in the last-named foundation he himself became a monk. About 579 he was sent as papal apocrisiarius to Constantinople by Pelagius II. He returned to Rome in 585, and in 590 was elected pope. He restored the monastic discipline, enforced the rule of celibacy of the clergy, arranged the Gregorian modes or chant, and displayed great zeal in propagating Christianity. It is said that when a monk he saw some heathen Anglo-Saxon youths exposed for sale in the slave-market at Rome, and that on ascertaining their nationality he exclaimed, "They would be indeed not Angli, but angeli (angels), if they were Christians!" He would have gone himself as a missionary to Britain, but was restrained by the Pope. In 597 he sent Augustine, accompanied by 40 monks, to Ethelbert, king of Kent, who was baptized with 10,000 of his subjects in the space of a year. His memory is stained by an adulatory letter of congratulation to the usurper and murderer Phocas on his accession to the imperial throne, written with a view to gaining his support in a dispute with the patriarch of Constantinople. He was the author of numerous homilies on Ezekiel and the Gospels, "Morals," "Regula (or Cura) Pastoralis," "Dialogues," "Letters," "Liber Sacramentorum," "Liber Antiphonarius," etc. The best edition of his works is the "Benedictine" (1705).

Next to Leo I. he [Gregory I.] was the greatest of the ancient bishops of Rome, and he marks the transition of the patriarchal system into the strict papacy of the middle ages. Schaff, History of the Christian Church, III. 328.

Gregory II., Saint, Pope. Died Feb. 10, 731. Pope 715-731. He sent Boniface as missionary to the Germans 719, and opposed the iconoclasm of Leo the Isaurian. He is commemorated by the Roman Catholic Church on Feb. 13.

Gregory III., Saint. Died Nov., 741. Pope 731-741. He convoked at Rome, in 732, a council which denounced iconoclasm and confirmed the worship of images. He is commemorated on Nov. 28.

Gregory IV. Died Jan., 844. Pope 827-844. He attempted to adjust the quarrel between the three rebellious sons of Louis le Débonnaire and their father, with the result that he offended both parties, and also the French bishops.

Gregory V. (Bruno of Carinthia). Died Feb. 18, 999. Pope 996-999. He was elected through the influence of his uncle, the emperor Otto III., and was the first German pope. He was opposed by the Roman senator Crescentius, who procured the elevation of the antipope John XVI. He was restored the next year on the appearance of Otto in Italy with an army, and the execution of Crescentius and John.

Gregory VI. (Johannes Gratianus). Died at Cologne about 1048. Pope 1045-46. He had as rival claimants to the papal dignity Benedict IX. and Sylvester III. All three were deposed in 1046 by the emperor Henry III., who placed Clement II. in the apostolic chair.

Gregory VII., Saint (Hildebrand). Born at Saona (or Soano), Tuscany, about 1020; died at Salerno, Italy, May 25, 1085. Pope 1073-85. He was of obscure origin, assumed the Benedictine habit at Rome, and became chaplain to Gregory VI., whom he accompanied in his exile. He entered the monastery of Cluny in 1048, and in 1049 was invited to Rome by Pope Leo IX. He was created cardinal-archdeacon about 1050, from which time he almost uninterruptedly conducted the temporal policy of the curia until his own elevation. He procured the election of Nicholas II. and of Alexander II., whom he succeeded in 1073. The grand object of his policy was to establish the supremacy of the papacy within the church, and of the church over the state. He issued a decree against lay investitures (c. 7, Dist. LXIII. Gratian), clergy with the secular estates and rights of their spiritual benefices by the temporal power) in 1075, and in 1076 cited Henry IV. of Germany to Rome to answer for the crimes of simony, sacrilege, and oppression. Henry, enraged at this assumption of authority, declared the deposition of Gregory, who in return issued a sentence excommunicating Henry suspended from the royal office by the disaffected German princes in alliance with the Pope at the Diet of Tribur in Oct., 1076, but did penance before the Pope at Canossa Jan. 25-27, 1077, and received a conditional absolution. The excommunication was, however, renewed in 1078, and war ensued. Henry defeated (1080) Rudolf of Swabia, put forward as king by the papal party in Germany, appointed Clement III. antipope (1080), captured Rome (1084), and besieged Gregory in the castle of St. Angelo. Gregory was rescued by Robert Guiscard, but died in exile.

Gregory VIII. (Maurice Bourdin). Died 1125. Antipope. On the death of Paschal II. in 1118, the party at Rome adverse to the emperor Henry V. elected Gelasius II., while the emperor elevated Gregory VIII. Gelasius died in 1119, and his party elected Calixtus II. The emperor subsequently made his peace with Calixtus and abandoned Gregory, who was imprisoned by Calixtus in 1121 and kept in confinement until his death.

Gregory VIII. Died Dec. 17, 1187. Pope Oct.–Dec., 1187.

Gregory IX. (Ugolino, Count of Segni). Born about 1147: died at Rome, Aug. 21, 1241. Pope 1227-41. His reign was occupied by the struggle between the Ghibellines and the emperor Frederick II. on the one hand, and the Guelphs and the Lombard cities.

Gregory X. (Teobaldo di Visconti). Born at Piacenza, Italy: died at Arezzo, Italy, Jan. 10, 1276. Pope 1271-76.

Gregory XI. (Pierre Roger de Beaufort). Born in Limousin, France: died at Rome, March, 1378. Pope 1370-78. He terminated the "Babylonish Captivity" at Avignon by removing to Rome in 1377.

Gregory XII. (Angelo di Corraro or Corario). Born at Venice about 1325; died as cardinal bishop of Porto, Oct. 18, 1417. Pope 1406-1415. He was elected by the Roman cardinals in 1406 in opposition to Benedict XIII., who reigned at Avignon, and together with whom he was deposed by the Council of Pisa in 1409. He refused to yield until 1415, when he resigned at the Council of Constance.

Gregory XIII. (Ugo Buoncompagni). Born at Bologna, Italy. Feb. 7, 1502: died April 10, 1585. Pope 1572–85. He introduced the Gregorian calendar in 1582.

Gregory XIV. (Nicolo Sfondrati). Pope 1590–1591.

Gregory XV. (Alessandro Ludovisi). Born at Bologna, Italy, 1554: died July, 1623. Pope 1621–23. He founded the Congregation of the Propaganda in 1622.

Gregory XVI. (Bartolommeo Alberto Cappellari). Born at Belluno, Italy, Sept. 18, 1765: died at Rome, June 1, 1846. Pope 1831–46. Popular insurrections took place in the Papal States at the beginning of his reign, which were suppressed only by means of Austrian intervention.

Gregory of Nazianzus, or Gregory Nazianzen, Saint, surnamed Theologus ('the Theologian'). Born at Nazianzus, Cappadocia, about 325: died about 390. One of the fathers of the Eastern Church. He was the leader of the orthodox party at Constantinople in 379, and was made bishop of Constantinople in 380.

Gregory of Nyssa, Saint. Born probably at Cæsarea, Cappadocia, about 335 (331 ?): died about 395 (400 ?). A father of the Eastern Church. He was a younger brother of Basil the Great, by whom he was made bishop of Nyssa, Cappadocia, in 372. He opposed Arianism, and was banished in 376 by Valens, under whom the latter was restored to his see. His works have been edited by Migne and others.

Gregory of Tours, Saint (Georgius Florentius). Born at Clermont, Auvergne, France, about 540: died at Tours, France, Nov. 17, 594. A Frankish historian. He became bishop of Tours in 573. His chief work is a "Historia Francorum" in 10 books, the chief authority for the history of the Merovingians to 591.

Gregory Thaumaturgus (thâ-ma-tėr′gus), Saint (Theodorus). Born at Neocæsarea, Pontus, about 210: died about 270. One of the fathers of the Eastern Church. He was for many years bishop of his native city, and received the surname Thaumaturgus ('wonder-worker') on account of the numerous miracles he was reported to have performed. His extant works consist of one epistle, a panegyrical oration on Origen, and a paraphrase of the book of Ecclesiastes.

Gregory, 1. In Shakspere's "Romeo and Juliet," a servant to Capulet.—2. In Fielding's "Mock Doctor," the name given to the character called Sganarelle in Molière's "Le médecin malgré lui," from which it is taken. He is a fagot-maker who pretends to be a doctor.

Gregory, David. Born at Kinnairdie, Banffshire, Scotland, June 24, 1661: died at Maidenhead, Berkshire, England, Oct. 10, 1708. A Scottish mathematician. He became professor of mathematics at Edinburgh in 1683, and was "the first professor who publicly lectured on the Newtonian philosophy" (Dict. Nat. Biog.). In 1691 he was appointed Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, and became a fellow of the Royal Society in 1692. He wrote "Astronomiæ physicæ et geometricæ elementa" (1702), edited the works of Euclid (1703), and left several treatises in manuscript. Various papers by him were published in the "Transactions" of the Royal Society.

Gregory, Duncan Farquharson. Born at Edinburgh, April 13, 1813: died there, Feb. 23, 1844. A Scottish mathematician. Population (1891), 60,439.

Grenville (gren′vil), Sir Bevil. Born at Brinn, Cornwall, March 23, 1595: killed at Lansdowne, near Bath, July 5, 1643. An English Royalist soldier. He led the van at Bradock Down, Jan. 19, 1643, where the Parliamentarians were defeated, and fell in the attack on Sir William Waller's forces at Lansdowne.

Grenville, George. Born Oct. 14, 1712: died at London, Nov. 13, 1770. An English statesman. He entered Parliament in 1741; became a lord of the admiralty in 1744; was a lord of the treasury June, 1747–Nov., 1754; was treasurer of the navy Nov., 1756–62 (with a seat in the cabinet in 1761); became secretary of state for the northern department in May, 1762; and became first lord of the admiralty in Oct. of that year. From Oct., 1763, to Oct., 1765, he was leader of the House of Commons. He became premier in April, 1763, and retained office until July, 1765. He prosecuted Wilkes, and opposed the repeal of the Stamp Act. He obtained the nickname of "the Gentle Shepherd" in an encounter with Pitt. "He interposed in defense of Dashwood's proposition of an additional duty on cider, and reminded the house that the profusion with which the late war had been carried on necessitated the imposition of new taxes. He wished gentlemen would show him where to lay them. (On his) repeating this question in his querulous, languid, fatiguing tone, Pitt, who sat opposite to him, mimicking his accent aloud, repeated these words of an old ditty, "Gentle shepherd, tell me where!" and then, rising, abused Grenville bitterly." Dict. Nat. Biog.

Grenville, or Greynvile, Sir Richard. Born about 1541: died Sept., 1591. A British naval hero. He was a cousin of Sir Walter Raleigh. In 1585 he commanded a fleet of 7 vessels which took part in the colonization of Virginia. In 1591 he was in command in the fleet of 16 ships under Lord Thomas Howard which sailed to the Azores to intercept the Spanish treasure-ships. While the English under Howard and Flores, a Spanish fleet of 53 sail appeared, and Howard put to sea to avoid it. Grenville, however, refused to follow, and when, later, he rashly attempted to pass through the Spanish fleet, was becalmed and was attacked by the whole Spanish fleet. He maintained a hand-to-hand fight for 15 hours, and only surrendered when all but 90 of his 150 men were slain. He died a few days after the battle.

Grenville, Richard Plantagenet Temple Nugent Brydges Chandos, second Duke of Buckingham and Chandos. Born at London, Feb. 11, 1797: died there, July 29, 1861. An English historian. He was known as Earl Temple 1813–22, and as Marquis of Chandos 1822–39, when he succeeded his father as duke. He was member of Parliament for Buckinghamshire 1818–32, and was lord privy seal 1841–42. He introduced into the Reform Bill in 1832 the clause known as the Chandos clause, which enabled the franchise in counties to 50*l*. He wrote "Memoirs of the Court and Cabinets of George III. (1853–55), "Memoirs of the Court of England during the Regency (1856), "Memoirs of the Court of George IV. (1859), "Memoirs of the Courts and Cabinets of William IV. and Victoria" (1861), etc.

Grenville, Richard Temple (later Grenville-Temple), Earl Temple. Born Sept. 26, 1711: died Sept. 12, 1779. An English politician, brother-in-law of Pitt, and first lord of the admiralty under the Duke of Devonshire 1756–57, and lord privy seal under the Duke of Newcastle 1757–61. He was a patron of Wilkes, and was thought by some to be the author of the "Letters of Junius."

Grenville, Thomas. Born Dec. 31, 1755: died at London, Dec. 17, 1846. An English politician (Whig) and diplomatist, best known as a bookcollector. He bequeathed over 20,000 volumes to the British Museum.

Grenville, William Wyndham, Baron Grenville. Born Oct. 25, 1759: died at Dropmore, Bucks, England, Jan. 12, 1834. An English statesman, son of George Grenville. He entered Parliament in 1782; was appointed paymaster-general of the army in 1783; was chosen speaker of the House of Commons about 1789; was created Baron Grenville in 1790; and was secretary for foreign affairs in Pitt's ministry 1791–1801. In 1806 he combined with Fox to form the ministry of "All the Talents," of which he was premier. The death of Fox in the same year weakened the ministry, and Grenville was compelled to resign in 1807.

He was a fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and vice-president of the college, 1840–69. He published "Fasti temporis cathedri, etc." (Part I., 1852), "General Tables of the Fasti cathedri, or Fasti temporis perpetui, from B. C. 4004 to A. D. 2000" (1852), "Origines calendariæ hellenicæ" (1854), etc.

Greta Hall (gre'tā hâl). The residence of Southey. It is in the vale of Keswick, Cumberland.

Gretchen (grech'en; G. pron. gret'chen), [G., a dim. of Margaret.] The principal female character of Goethe's "Faust." She is a simple girl of the lower ranks of life, charming in her innocence and confiding love for Faust.

He has never created anything sublimer than this ideal picture of innocence, simplicity, warmth and depth of affection; her suddenly rousing at the outset, the spirit of noble purity which breathes around her, her little world of domestic duties, the truly feminine instinct with which she tends her little sister, the natural grace with which she reveals her feelings, the naive love of ornament natural to the girl of the people; then the first shadows which fall on this trans-parent soul, the miserivings roused by Faust's bold boldness, the mysterious dread of God and involuntary shudder at Mephisto's presence, her pious anxiety about the spiritual welfare of her lover, her devotion and utter surrender to him, her inability to refuse him anything, and then all the fell consequences of her weakness, madness, prison, and death — a fearful transition this from the idyllic to the tragical!

Scherer, History of German Literature, II. 327.

Grethel (greth'el; G. pron. grā'tel), Gammer. The fictitious narrator of "Grimm's Tales."

Gretna Green (gret'nā grēn). A farmsteading near the village of Springfield, Dumfriesshire, Scotland, 8 miles northwest of Carlisle. The name was afterward applied to the village, which became notorious for the celebration of irregular marriages contracted by runaway parties from England. These marriages were rendered invalid (unless one of the parties has resided for some weeks in Scotland) by an act passed in 1856.

Grétry (grā-trē'), André Ernest Modeste. Born at Liége, Belgium, Feb. 8, 1741; died at Montmorency, near Paris, Sept. 24, 1813. A French composer. His works include the operas "Le Huron" (1768), "Lucile" (1769), "Le tableau parlant" (1769), "Zémire et Azor" (1771), "L'Amant jaloux" (1778), "L'Epreuve villageoise," "Richard Cœur de Lion" (1784), "Guillaume Tell" (1791), "Lisbeth" (1797), etc. He also wrote several books, "Mémoires ou essais sur la musique" (1789), "De la vérité, etc." (1803), etc.

Greuze (grēz), Jean Baptiste. Born at Tournus, France, Aug. 21, 1725; died at Paris, March 21, 1805. A genre and portrait painter, pupil at Lyons of Grondon, and in Paris (1755) of the Academy. In 1755 he went to Italy with the Abbé Gougenot. In 1767 he retired to Auxon, whence he returned to exhibit pictures in his studio. He amassed a large fortune, which was lost in the Revolution. Neglected by the public, which admired only the new school of David, he passed his last years in misery and neglect.

Grève (grāv), Place de la. The place of execution of ancient Paris. Until the creation of the Place du Carrousel, it was the largest open space in the city; was also used as a market; and was the point most intimately associated with the business of the city. For this reason it was chosen for the location of the Hôtel de Ville, which now stands there. The space in front of it, formerly the Place de la Grève, is now called Place de l'Hôtel de Ville. Besides being the place for the execution of criminals, innocent victims have been shot here in nearly every revolution that has occurred in Paris. Its name ('the strand') was given it on account of its position on the bank of the Seine. The Quai de la Grève was one of the three earliest ports, as they were called, of Paris: it doubtless dates from Roman times.

Greville (grev'il). A conceited and obstinate lover of Miss Harriet Byron in Richardson's "Sir Charles Grandison."

Greville, Charles Cavendish Fulke. Born April 2, 1794; died at London, Jan. 18, 1865. An English diarist, grandson of the fifth Lord Brooke, and, on his mother's side, grandson of the third Duke of Portland. He was secretary of Jamaica and clerk of the privy council. For 40 years he recorded in his diary his impressions and intimate knowledge of contemporary English politics and politicians. These "Memoirs" were published after his death by Henry Reeve: first series, 1817–37 (3 vols. 1875), second and third series, 1837–60 (3 vols. 1885, 2 vols. 1887).

Greville, Fulke, first Lord Brooke. Born at Beauchamp Court, Warwickshire, 1554; died Sept. 30, 1628. An English poet and statesman. He studied at Jesus College, Cambridge; became a favorite of Queen Elizabeth; and was an intimate friend and the biographer of his kinsman Sir Philip Sidney. He became secretary for Wales in 1583; treasurer "of the wars" in March, and of the navy Sept., 1598; chancellor of the exchequer in 1614; and commissioner of the treasury in 1618. He was stabbed, Sept. 1, by a servant, Ralph Haywood, one of the witnesses to his will, to whom he failed to leave a legacy. His epitaph, composed by himself, was: "Fulke Greville, servant to Queen Elizabeth, councillor to King James, and friend to Sir Philip Sidney." His works were reprinted by the Chiswick press, 1870.

Greville (grā-vēl'), Henry. The pseudonym of Alice Marie Céleste Durand.

Greville (grev'il), Robert, second Lord Brooke. Born 1608: died March 2, 1643. An English Parliamentary general in the civil war, only son of Fulke Greville. He defeated the Earl of Northampton at Kineton, near Banbury, Aug. 3, 1642; was appointed in Jan., 1643, commander-in-chief of the counties of Warwick, Stafford, Leicester, and Derby; captured Stratford-on-Avon in Feb.; and was killed at Lichfield. He wrote "The Nature, Office, etc." (1640), and other works.

Greville, Robert Kaye. Born at Bishop Auckland, Durham, Dec. 13, 1794; died near Edinburgh, June 4, 1866. A British botanist. He published "Scottish Cryptogamic Flora," "Flora Edinensis" (begun in 1822), "Algæ Britannicæ" (1830), and other works; began in 1829, "Algæ Britannicæ" (1830), the botany of India and of British North America in the "Edinburgh Cabinet Library." He was an opponent of slavery and a supporter of the cause of temperance.

Grévy (grā-vē'), Albert. Born at Mont-sous-Vaudrey, department of Jura, Aug. 23, 1824. A French statesman, brother of François Paul Jules Grévy. He was elected to the National Assembly in 1871, and to the Chamber of Deputies in 1874. He was civil and military governor of Algeria 1879–81.

He was a deputy to the Constituent Assembly in 1848, and to the Legislative Assembly; to the Corps Legislatif 1868–70; and was president of the National Assembly 1871–73, and of the Chamber of Deputies 1876 and 1877–79. He succeeded Mac-Mahon as president of the French republic in 1879; was re-elected in Dec., 1885; and was compelled to resign in 1887, owing to the traffic which his son-in-law Wilson carried on in offices and decorations.

Grew (grō), Nehemiah. Born 1641: died March 25, 1712. An English botanist, noted for his studies in vegetable anatomy and physiology. He graduated at Cambridge (Pembroke Hall) in 1661, and took the degree of doctor of medicine at Leyden in 1671. In 1677 he became secretary of the Royal Society, and edited the "Philosophical Transactions" (Jan., 1678,–Feb., 1679). His chief work, "The Anatomy of Plants," was published in 1682.

Grey (grā), Charles, first Earl Grey. Born at Howick, 1729: died there, Nov. 14, 1807. An English general. He became colonel and king's aide-de-camp in 1772; joined Howe in America in 1776 (with the rank of major-general); returned to England in Dec., 1778; and, Sept. 21, 1777; commanded a brigade at Germantown Oct. 4, 1777; captured New Bedford and Martha's Vineyard in 1778; returned to England in 1779; and was appointed commander-in-chief in America—an appointment which the close of the war rendered inoperative. In 1793 he was appointed with Jervis (later Earl St. Vincent) commander of an expedition to the French West Indies. They reduced Martinique in March, and St. Lucia and Guadeloupe in April, 1794.

Grey, Charles, second Earl Grey, and Viscount Howick. Born at Fallodon, near Alnwick, Northumberland, March 13, 1764: died July 17, 1845. An English Whig statesman. Grimm, Jakob. Born at Hanau, Jan. 4, 1785: died at Berlin, Sept. 20, 1863. A German philologist and writer. He studied jurisprudence at Marburg. In 1805 he went to Paris to assist Savigny, whose pupil he had been. The following year he was at the military school in Cassel. In 1808 he became librarian to the King of Westphalia. After 1814 he lived and labored with his brother Wilhelm in the closest association. They were together librarians at Cassel; 1830 to 1837 professors at Gottingen; subsequently again at Cassel; and in 1841 were called as professors to the University of Berlin. In 1812 and 1815 they published conjointly the well-known book of fairy tales "Kinder- und Hausmarchen ("Children's and Domestic Tales," 3 vols., frequently called "German Legends"), and after 1832 worked together on the great "Deutsches Worterbuch" ("German Dictionary"). Jakob's independent work consisted of the "Deutsches Recht" (1840, expanded 1828 into "Deutsche Rechtsalterthümer." Beginning with 1829, his "Deutsche Grammatik" ("German Grammar") appeared. His last is the fundamental work in comparative Germanic philology, of which specific branch he may be called the founder. Its principal terminology originated with him, and one of its most characteristic phases, that of the relative correspondence of consonants, was first formulated by him, and bears the name of Grimm's Law. In 1855 appeared another great work, the "Deutsche Mythologie." His numerous "Kleinere Schriften" appeared at Berlin, 1864–82, in 6 vols.

Grimm, Ludwig Emil. Born at Hanau, Prussia, May 14, 1790: died at Cassel, Prussia, April 4, 1863. A German painter and etcher, brother of Jakob and Wilhelm Grimm.

Until the peace of Westphalia, in 1648, he was a soldier, but subsequently is supposed to have traveled in Holland, France, and Switzerland. He was effected with the service of the Bishop of Strasburg, and ultimately magistrate at Renchen where he died. His principal work, and the most important of its class in German literature, is the romance "Der abenteuerliche Simplicissimus: Das 5te, Beschreibung des Lebens eines seltzamen Vagunten genant Melchior Sternfels von Fuchshaim" ("The Adventurous one simplicissimus: That is, Description of the Life of a Strange Vagabond named Melchior Sternfels von Fuchshaim," 1669).

Grim's Dyke, or Grimesditch. See the extract.

> The Belgæ were of the same Keltic family as the Kymry and the Gaels. But coming later from the continent they brought with them its latest civilization, and, as settlers, perhaps for centuries, in the lowlands between the Somme and the Scheldt, they had acquired the instinct of throwing up dykes and earthworks. The actual occupants of Hampshire, Sussex, and Kent were subdued or driven out, and the great fortified fosse, Grim's Dyke, which encloses Salisbury and Silchester was at once the rampart and the march of the new nationality.

Pearson, Hist. Eng., I. 6.

Gringore (graṅ-gōr'), or Gringoire (graṅ-gwär') (originally Gringor), Pierre. Born in Normandy, 1475–80: died 1544. A French satirist and dramatic writer. Among his works are "Saint Loys" (a mystery), "Les folles enterprises" (a series of monologues), "La chasse du cerf des cerfs," "Le coquetuche," etc.

It is to him that we owe the only complete and really noteworthy tetralogy, composed of cry, sotie, morality, and farce, which exists to show the final result of the medieval play — the 'Jeu du Prince des Sots.' . . . Gringore first emerges as a pamphleteer in verse, on the side of the policy of Louis XII. He held the important position of mère sotte in the company of persons who charged themselves with playing the sotie, and Louis perceived the advantages which he might gain by enlisting such a writer on his side.

He wrote "Die Vegetation der Erde" (1872), etc.

Griselda (gri-zel'dą), or Griseldis, or Grissel. A character of romance, noted for the patience with which she submitted to the most cruel ordeals as a wife and mother. The subject has been variously treated by Boccaccio, Chaucer, Petrarch, and other writers. The story of "Patient Grissel" appeared about 1565, and a prose history shortly after. "From whatever source derived, 'Griselda' appears to have been the most popular of all the stories of the 'Decameron.' In the fourteenth century the prose translations of it in French were very numerous: Legrand mentions that he had seen upwards of twenty, under different names, 'Miroir des dames,' 'Exemples de bonnes et mauvaises femmes,' etc. Petrarch, who had not seen the 'Decameron' till a short time before his death (which shows that Boccaccio was ashamed of the work), was much admired as a writer, as appears from his letters, and translated it into Latin in 1373. Chaucer, who borrowed the story from Petrarch, assigns it to the clerical students in his 'Canterbury Tales.' Petrarch declares in his prologue that he learned it from Petrarch at Padua; and, if we may believe Warton, Chaucer, when in Italy, actually heard the story related by Petrarch, who, before translating it into Latin, had got it by heart in order to repeat to his friends. The tale became so popular in France that the comedians of Paris represented, in 1393, a Mystery in which the sufferings of Griselda were dramatized." There is also an English drama called 'Patient Grissel,' entered in Stationers Hall, 1569. One of Goldoni's plays, in which the tyrannical husband is King of Thessaly, is also formed on the subject of Griselda. Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, II. 146.

Grosseteste (grōs' test), Robert. Died 1253. An English divine and scholar, elected bishop of Lincoln in 1235. He studied at Oxford and Paris; later became chancellor at Oxford and (1224) first rector of the Franciscans there; and was appointed archdeacon of Wilts (1214, 1220), archdeacon of Northampton 1221, and later archdeacon of Leicester. He also held the prebend of Empingham in Lincoln cathedral. He was energetic in reforming abuses in his diocese. In 1239 he fell into a protracted quarrel with the chapter of Lincoln over his right of visitation, which was finally settled by the Pope in his favor. His career throughout was marked by a vigorous defense of his rights and the right against all opponents, including king and Pope. A notable instance of this was his refusal (1253), on the ground of unfitness, to induct into a canonry at Lincoln the Pope's nephew Frederick di Lavanga. Grosseteste was a voluminous writer, and long exerted a great influence upon English thought and literature.

Robert Grosseteste, a man of spotless orthodoxy, and unquestionably the first English scholar of the age. Without any advantages of birth or person, Grosseteste had already begun to mount the ladder of fame. The son of a mere peasant, he was generally described by a nickname which in Latin was rendered Capito, or Grossum Caput, and in English Greathead, or Grethead. The dates of his birth is unknown, and it is not certain whether he took his degree in arts at Oxford or at Paris. Before becoming a lecturer in the Franciscan convent, he had been successively appointed to the archdeaconries of Lincoln, Wilts, Northampton, and Leicester, and he seems to have held the last two of these preferments until the year 1231.

Grotefend (grō'te-fend), Georg Friedrich. Born at Münden, near Cassel, Prussia, June 9, 1775; died at Hannover, Prussia, Dec. 15, 1853. A noted German philologist and archæologist. He professor (later conrector) of the gymnasium at Frankfort-on-the-Main (1803–21), and director of the lyceum at Hannover (1821–49). He is especially noted for his labors on the decipherment of the cuneiform inscriptions. His works include "Neue Beitrage zur Erläuterung der persepolitanischen Keilschrift" (1837), "Rudimenta linguæ Umbricæ" (1835–38), "Rudimenta linguæ Oscæ" (1839), etc. See the extract.

The clue to the decipherment of the [cuneiform] inscriptions was first discovered by the successful guess of a German scholar, Grotefend. Grotefend noticed that the inscriptions generally began with three or four words, one of which varied, while the others remained unchanged. The variable word had three forms, though the same form always appeared on the same monument. Grotefend, therefore, conjectured that this word represented the name of a king, the words which followed it being the royal titles. Of the supposed kings' names appeared much oftener than the others, and as it was too short for Artaxerxes and too long for Cyrus, it was evident that it must stand either for Darius or for Xerxes. A study of the classical authors showed Grotefend that certain of the monuments on which it was found had been constructed by Darius, and he accordingly gave to the characters composing it the values required for spelling "Darius" in his old Persian form. In this way he succeeded in obtaining conjectural values for six cuneiform letters. He now turned to the second royal name, which also appeared on several monuments, and was of much the same length as that of Darius. This could only be Xerxes, but in so the fifth letter composing it would be equally be the same as the third letter in the name of Darius. This proved to be the case.
Sayce, Anc. Monuments, p. 13.

Groth (grōt), Klaus. Born at Heide, in Holstein, April 24, 1819. A German dialect poet. He wrote in 1853 the first volume of "Quickborn" ("Living Spring"), poems of popular life in the Platt-Deutsch (Low German) dialect. The Hieronymite convent of Santa Maria is a noble foundation, royally endowed. The buildings are very extensive. The church is massive, in Pointed architecture, with a sumptuous retable and many tombs. The sacristy is reputed one of the finest in Spain: it contains paintings by Zurbaran and by Luca Giordano. There are two fine cloisters—one in the Moresco style, the other Pointed. Population (1887), 2,964.

Guadalupe (gä-dä-lōp'; Sp. pron. gwä-thä-lō'pā). A river in southern Texas which joins the San Antonio, about 10 miles from its mouth. Length, about 250 miles.

Guadalupe-Hidalgo (gwä-thä-lō'pā-ē-däl'gō). A town in the federal district, Mexico, 3 miles north of Mexico. It is celebrated for its chapel on the spot where the Virgin is said to have appeared to a shepherd. By a treaty signed here Feb. 2, 1848, Mexico ceded a large territory, comprising the modern California, Nevada, Utah, most of Arizona, a large part of New Mexico, and parts of Colorado and Wyoming, to the United States.

Guadeloupe (gä-de-lōp'; F. pron. gwäd-lōp'). An island of the West Indies, belonging to France, intersected by lat. 16° 15′ N., long. 61° 30′ W. It consists of two parts separated by a narrow channel—Guadeloupe proper on the southeast, and Grande-Terre on the east. The former is mountainous, the latter generally low. The chief product is sugar. The capitals Basse-Terre, the largest place, Pointe-à-Pitre. The island, with Marie-Galante, La Désirade, Les Saintes, St.-Bartholomew, and part of St.-Martin, forms a government. It was discovered by Columbus, Nov. 3, 1493, was colonized in 1635, and in 1763 was several times taken by Great Britain; and was finally secured to France in 1815. Area, 618 square miles. Population (1889) of Guadeloupe, 142,291; of Guadeloupe and its dependencies, 165,809.

Guadet (gä-dā'), Marguerite Élie. Born at St.-Émilion, near Bordeaux, France, July 20, 1758: guillotined at Bordeaux, June 15, 1794. A French Girondist leader, deputy to the Legislative Assembly in 1791, and to the Convention in 1792.

Guadiana (gwä-thē-ä'nä or gwä-dē-ä'nä). A river of Spain and Portugal, forming in part of its course a boundary between the two countries: the ancient Anas. It flows into the Atlantic in lat. 37° 9′ N., long. 7° 18′ W. In its upper course (according to some accounts) it flows underground for over 20 miles. Length, over 400 miles.

Guadix (gwä-thēch'). A town in the province of Granada, Spain, 30 miles east-northeast of Granada. It has a cathedral and a ruined castle. Population (1887), 11,989.

Guaduas (gwä-thwäs). A town in the department of Cundinamarca, Colombia, situated about lat. 5° S., long. 74° 50′ W. Population, about 8,000.

Guagues. See Quaquas.

Guahan (gwä-hän'), or Guam (gwäm), or San Juan (sän hō-än'), Sp. Guajan (gwä-hän'). The southernmost and largest of the Ladrones, Pacific Ocean, intersected by 13° 26′ N. and long. 144° 40′ E. Principal place, Agaña. Population (1887), 8,561.

Guaharibos (gwä-ä-rē'bōs). A tribe of Indians of the Carib stock, in southern Venezuela, living about the head waters of the Orinoco and Caura. Formerly numerous and formidable, they are now reduced to a few hundred, who stand in great fear of the whites and have little intercourse with them.

Guahibos (gwä-ē'bōs). An Indian tribe of the upper Orinoco valley. They were formerly powerful, but are now reduced to a few thousand, near the Orinoco, between the Meta and the Vichada. They are nomadic, rarely passing two nights in the same place; live by hunting and fishing and on wild fruits; and are savages of a low grade. About 1797 they were gathered into mission villages, but they soon returned to the plains, and have remained inveterate enemies of the whites. Their color is lighter than that of most Indians. Their linguistic relations are doubtful. Also written Guayhas, Guajivos, Guahiros.

Guaicas, or Guaycas. See Quaquas.

Guaicuris, or Guaikeries. See Guaiquería.

Guaimis (gwī'mēs). An Indian tribe of southeastern Costa Rica, near the Bay of Chiriqui, on both sides of the central Cordillera. Their language appears to have some relation to that of the ancient Chibchas of New Granada.

Guaiqueris (gwī-kā-rēs'). A tribe of Indians which formerly occupied the island of Margarita and the adjacent parts of Venezuela. They are supposed to have been of Carib stock. Their descendants live in the same region, but speak only Spanish. Also written Guaiqueres, Guaicaris, and Guachires.

Guaira, La. See La Guayra.

Guajira (gwā-hē'rā), or Goahira (gwā-ē'rā). A peninsula, partly in Venezuela and partly in Colombia, projecting into the Caribbean Sea northwest of Lake Maracaibo.

Guajivos. See Guahibos.

Gual (gwāl). Pedro. Born at Caracas, Jan. 31, 1784; died at Guayaquil, Ecuador, May 6, 1862. A Venezuelan statesman. He was a lawyer; joined the patriots in 1810; occupied many important civil and diplomatic posts; was one of the leaders of the insurrection against Monagas in 1858; and was vice-president and president ad interim in 1860.

Gualdo Tadino (gwäl'dō tä-dē'nō). A town in the province of Perugia, Italy, 21 miles east-northeast of Perugia. Near this place, at the ancient Tagine (Tadinum), Narses defeated Totila in 552. It has a cathedral. Population (1881), commune, 8,477.

Gualeguay (gwā-lā-gwī'). A town in the province of Entre Rios, Argentine Republic, situated on the river Gualeguay 120 miles north by west of Buenos Ayres. Population (1889), 11,000.

Gualeguaychú (gwā-lā-gwī-chō'). A town in the province of Entre Rios, Argentine Republic, situated on the river Gualeguaychú 115 miles north of Buenos Ayres. It was founded in 1783. Population (1889), about 14,000.

Guam. See Guahan.

Guamanga (gwä-män'gä), or Huamanga (wä-män'gä). A city of Peru, now called Ayacucho.

Guamas (gwā-mäs'). An Indian tribe of the Orinoco valley, on the Apure. They were formerly numerous, had large villages, were agricultural, and were skilled in the manufacture of pottery and other objects. They were perhaps of Tupi stock. The tribe is nearly extinct.

Guamos. Same as Guamos.

Guanabacoa (gwä-nä-bä-kō'ä). A town in Cuba, 5 miles east of Havana. It is the residence of many Havana merchants, and a sea-bathing resort. Population (1887), 11,141; with the suburbs, 25,943.

Guanahani (gwä-nä-ä-nē'). The first island discovered by Columbus in his voyage of 1492, and consequently the first American land seen by modern European eyes. It was described as low and flat, covered with trees, surrounded by reefs, and having a lake in the center. It was certainly one of the Bahamas, near the middle of the group, but the exact identity can not now be determined with certainty. The weight of opinion inclines to Watlings Island; but various writers have supposed it to be Cat Island, Samana, Acklin, Mariguana, or Grand Turk.

Guanajuato (gwä-nä-hō-ä'tō). 1. A state of Mexico, bounded by San Luis Potosí on the north, Querétaro or Hidalgo on the east, Michoacan on the south, and Jalisco on the west. It is noted for the richness of its silver-mines. Area, 11,370 square miles. Population (1880), 1,097,196. Also written Guanaxuato.

2. The capital of the state of Guanajuato, situated about lat. 21° 1′ N., long. 100° 55′ W. It is the center of an important silver-mining region. Population (1890), 52,112.

Guanare (gwä-nä'rā). A town, capital of the state of Zamora, Venezuela. 218 miles southwest of Caracas. It was founded in 1593. Population, about 5,000.

Guanas (gō-ä-näs'). A tribe of South American Indians at present established in the southern part of the state of Matto Grosso, Brazil, near Miranda. They are divided into several subtribes known as Layanas, Lenoas, and Quiniquinaos. Physically and intellectually they are one of the finest tribes in South America, living in well-ordered villages, excelling in primitive arts, and subsisting mainly by agriculture. They are now reduced to a few thousand, who live in friendly relations with the Brazilians. Under the name Chanas or Chanes they were known in the 18th century, on the western side of the Paraguay, where the Jesuit authorities mention them as early as 1645. Their language is closely allied to that of the Moxos of the river Mamoré, of which tribe they are probably an offshoot. They belong to the great Arawak stock.

Guanches (gwänch'ez). The Berber tribe which inhabited the Canary Islands, West Africa. The colonization of these islands by the Guanches must have taken place before the Arabian invasion. The Guanches belonged to the red-haired variety of Berbers, and embalmed their dead, whom they preserved in caves like the Egyptians. They also used alphabetic and hieroglyphic characters in writing their language. Spanish has completely superseded the Guanch language, but it is said that the rural population still shows many Berber features and customs.

Guanes (gwä-näs'). An ancient Indian tribe of Colombia, which occupied the mountainous region in what is now the southern part of the department of Santander. They had attained some degree of civilization, and resisted the Spanish conquerors with great valor. Their descendants may be traced in the mixed races of the same region, and it is said that some wild hordes to the east were derived from them.

Guano Islands (gwä'no i'landz). Islands off the coast of Peru, noted for their deposits of guano. They comprise the Lobos Islands, Chincha Islands, etc.

Guap. See Yap.

Guapey (gwä-pāy'), or Guapay (gwä-pī'). A river in Bolivia which rises near Cochabamba, and unites with the Mamoré.

Guaporé (gwä-pō-rā'), called in its upper course Itenez (ē-te-näz'). A river in western Brazil and on the Brazilian and Bolivian border. It unites with the Mamoré in lat. 11° 54′ 13″ S. Length, over 900 miles.

Guaranys (gwä-ra-nēs'). ['Warriors.'] A powerful race of South American Indians who, at the time of the conquest, occupied most of the region now included in Paraguay, together with portions of Uruguay and of the Brazilian coast to Santa Catharina. They were divided into numerous tribes and villages with different names, not bound together by any permanent league, but having essentially the same usages and customs. The Guaranys cultivated maize and other plants; had well-ordered towns, and practised rude arts: it does not appear that any of them were cannibals. Generally they received the whites as friends, though Spanish tyranny provoked some revolts; they were easily subdued. Among them the Jesuits established their most important missions. From this race, mingled with the Spaniards, was derived the modern population of Paraguay, where a corrupt form of Guarany is still the common language. In that country only the so-called Cuás of the upper Paraná remain in a wild state. The name is loosely used for semi-civilized Indians of Tupi stock in Argentina, Uruguay, and southern Brazil. The Guarany language has a considerable literature, including a newspaper. Also written Guaranis or Guaranies.

Guarany stock. See Tupi stock.

Guaratinguetá (gwä-rä-tēn-gwe-tä'). A town in the state of São Paulo, Brazil, situated on the Paraiba on the west bank north of Rio de Janeiro. Population, about 5,000.

Guaraunos (gwä-rä-ō'nōs or wä-rä-ō'nōs), called by the English of Guiana Warraus, or Guarraus (wä-rä-ōs'). A tribe of South American Indians about the mouth of the Orinoco. Formerly they seem to have been confined to the swampy lands of the delta, where they built their houses on piles or in trees; latterly they have occupied portions of the higher lands. They have plantations, but subsist mainly on fish and fruits. They are entirely distinct from those of surrounding tribes. The Guaraunos are friendly to the whites. A few thousand remain.

Guarayos (gwä-rä-yōs'). [Quichua: huaro, breeches, yoc, without; naked.] A tribe of Bolivian Indians occupying the part of wooded plains northeast of Santa Cruz de la Sierra. They are an offshoot of the Guaranys of Paraguay, speaking nearly the same language, but have occupied their present position during historical times. They are described as of fine color, and having beards. They are friendly to the whites, hospitable, and of good morals. A few thousand remain.

Guarayos. A name sometimes, but improperly, applied to the Ienes and other savage Indians of northern Bolivia.

Guardafui (gwär-dä-fwē'), or Gardafui (gär-dä-fwē'), Cape. A cape in the northeastern extremity of the Somali country, Africa, lat. 11° 50′ 30″ N., long. 51° 16′ 10″ E.: next to Ras Hafun, the easternmost point of Africa.

Guardi (gwär'dē). Francesco. Born 1712: died 1793. A Venetian painter.

Guardia (gwär-dē'ä), Tomás. Born at Bagaces, Guanacaste, Dec. 17, 1832; died July 7, 1882. A Costa-Rican general. He headed the revolt of 1870 which deposed Jimenez and made Carazza president but Guardia, though nominally remaining military commander, was really the head of state. From May 8, 1876, to May 8, 1882, he was president.

Guardian (gär'di-an). The. 1. A play by Massinger, licensed in 1633, played in 1634, and published in 1655.—2. A comedy by Abraham Cowley, acted at Cambridge in 1641 for Prince Charles. It was printed in 1650, and the writer was as "The Cutter of Coleman Street" in 1658.—3. A periodical published at London in 1713, and edited by Steele. It comprised 176 numbers (51 of them by Addison). It followed the "Spectator," and was inferior to it.

Guardian Angel, The. A novel by Oliver Wendell Holmes, published in 1868.

Guardiola (gwar-dē-ō'lä), Santos. Born about 1815; assassinated Jan. 17, 1862. A general and politician of Honduras. He was a rough and ready soldier who, after serving under Morazan and against Walker, was president of Honduras from F. to 17, 1856. His administration was, on the whole, good, though his previous acts had won for him the title of "the Tiger of Central America."

Guarico (gwä'rē-kō). Originally, in 1492, the Indian town in Haiti governed by Guacanagari. The name was transferred to the modern city near the same place, now known in English as Cape Haitien.

Guarini (gwä-rē'nē). Giovanni Battista. Born at Ferrara, Italy, Dec. 10, 1537; died at Venice, Oct. 4, 1612. A noted Italian poet and diplomatist, professor of belles-lettres at Ferrara. He was in the service of the court of Savoy, and later in that of Florence and that of Urbino. His last work is the pastoral drama "Il pastor fido," 1585.

Guarionex (gwa-re-o'neks). Died after 1510. An Indian chief of the region or "province" of Maeorix in the central part of Haiti. He received Columbus hospitably in 1494, and remained friendly to the whites until 1498, when he headed a revolt. Defeated, he fled to the country of Mayobanex, but was eventually captured and held as a hostage.

Guarneri (gwär-nā'rē), Latinized Guarnerius (gwär-nē'ri-us). Andrea. Born at Cremona, Italy, about 1630; died after 1695 (?). A noted Italian violin-maker.

Guarneri, Antonio Giuseppe. Born at Cremona, June 8, 1683; died 1745. A celebrated Italian violin-maker, nephew of Andrea Guarneri.

Guastalla (gwäs-täl'lä). A small town in the province of Reggio nell' Emilia, Italy, situated at the junction of the Crostolo with the Po, 19 miles northeast of Parma. The district of Guastalla, made a duchy in 1621, passed to Parma in 1748, to the Cisalpine Republic in 1796, to the Kingdom of Italy in 1805, to Maria Louisa in 1815, and to Modena in 1848.

Guatemala (gä-te-mä'lä; Sp. pron. gwä-te-mä'lä), incorrectly Guatimala (gwä-te-ma'lä). A republic of Central America. Capital, Guatemala. It is bounded on the north and northwest, British Honduras, the Gulf of Honduras, and Honduras on the east, Salvador on the southeast, and the Pacific Ocean on the southwest. The surface is generally mountainous. The chief product is coffee. It is divided into 22 departments. The executive is vested in a president, and legislation in a national assembly. Most of the people are Roman Catholics. When first discovered, Guatemala was conquered by Pedro de Alvarado, the lieutenant of Cortes, in 1524–26. It declared its independence in 1821, joining briefly the empire of Iturbide, and the Central American Confederation from 1823 to 1847, when it was established as an independent republic. It has had several wars with Salvador and Honduras. Area, 46,800 square miles. Population (1885), 1,466,612.

Guatemala, or Santiago de Guatemala (sän-te-ä'gō dā gwä-tā-mä'lä), sometimes called New Guatemala (Sp. Guatemala la Nueva). The capital of the republic of Guatemala, situated about lat. 14° 36′ N., long. 90° 27′ W. The chief building is the cathedral, begun in 1669 and in 1775, soon after the destruction of Old Guatemala. Population (1890), about 70,000.

Guatemala, Audience of. See Confines, Audiencia of the.

Guatemala, Old, or Antigua (än-te'gwä). A town of Guatemala, 24 miles west-southwest of New Guatemala. The original city of Guatemala, founded 1524, was destroyed by a flood from the Volcan de Agua 1541; refounded 1542, it was almost completely destroyed by the great earthquake of March 17, 1773; the capital was then removed to its present site, but the town of Antigua grew up about the ruins of the second city. Population, about 10,000.

Guatemala, Presidency of. The region in Central America which, during the colonial period, was subject to the jurisdiction of the Audience of the Confines or of Guatemala. See Confines. As originally limited, in 1545, it embraced all the present states of Central America, Tabasco, Yucatan, Campeachy, and Chiapas, the capital, after 1549, being at Guatemala. In 1548 Yucatan was placed under the Audience of Mexico, and in 1550 the latitude was reduced. From 1563 to 1570 the Central American colonies were made subject to New Spain (Mexico). In 1570 the Audience of the Confines was again established at Guatemala, and thereafter the presidency included the present Central American countries (except portions of the east coast which subsequently fell into the hands of the British), together with Tabasco and the Mexican province of West Guatemala, was ruled by captains-general, who were also generally presidents of the audience, but had independent powers similar to those of the Viceroys of New Spain and Peru. The provinces, corresponding to the present republics, were ruled by governors who, to a certain extent, were subject to the captain-general.

Guatemotzin (gwä-tā-mōt-zēn'), or Guatemoc (gwä'tā-mōk). ['Swooping eagle.'] Born about 1497: died in Tabasco early in 1525. The last Aztec sovereign of Mexico. He was nephew of Montezuma II., and was elected to the throne on the death of Cuitlahuatzin (Aug., 1520), defended Mexico against Cortes in the famous siege May–Aug., 1521; was captured Aug. 13; and was subsequently tortured in the hope that he would give up treasure. Led to execution in 1524 he was forced to go with Cortes on the march to Honduras; on the way he was accused of treachery and hanged. Also written Guatemozin, Quauhtemotzin, Cuauhtemoc, etc.

Guatescos. See Huastecs.

Guatos (gwä-tōs'). A South American Indian tribe in the swampy regions of the upper Paraguay River. Formerly they were very numerous and warlike; they are now reduced to a few hundred about the mouth of the Sao Lourenco tributary. The Guatos resemble Esquimaux in color and have short beards. They live almost entirely in canoes, fishing and hunting, making rude huts in the swamps and retiring to higher land only during the floods. They have long been friends of the Brazilians, and aided them in the war with Paraguay 1865-70. Their linguistic relations are doubtful.

Guatusos (gwä-tō'sōs). A tribe of Indians in northern Costa Rica, on the streams which flow into Lake Nicaragua. They practise agriculture, are enemies of the whites, and have always retained their independence. By their language they appear to constitute a distinct stock. Only a few hundred are left. Many of the older writers have erroneously supposed that the Guatusos were descended from Mexicans brought to this region by the Spaniards, or from the buccaneers. Also written Huatusos.

Guaviare (gwä-vē-ä'rē). A river in Colombia and Venezuela, joining the Orinoco about lat. 4° N., long. 68° 10′ W. Length, about 725 miles.

Guaxaca. See Oaxaca.

Guaxarapos, or Guasarapos. See Guaches.

Guayana. See Guiana.

Guayanas. Same as Guatusos.

Guayaquil (gwī-ä-kēl'), or Santiago de Guayaquil (sän-tē-ä'gō dä gwī-ä-kēl'). The chief seaport and most populous city of Ecuador, situated on the river Guayaquil in lat. 2° 12′ S., long. 79° 52′ W.; an important commercial place. Population (1890), 44,772.

Guayaquil, Gulf of. An inlet of the Pacific Ocean, west of Ecuador.

Guayas (gwī'äs). A maritime province of Ecuador. Capital, Guayaquil. Area, 8,220 square miles. Population, 98,042.

Guaybas. Same as Guahibos.

Guaycurus (gwī-kō-rōs'). A tribe of South American Indians, on the river Paraguay, in Brazil, near the Paraguayan frontier; now commonly known to Brazilians as Cadiueos, properly the name of one of their clans. The Paraguayans call them Abayas. They are powerfully built, brave, and warlike. Formerly they were very numerous and mounted, living by hunting and fishing and by robbing other tribes. They acquired horses from Spanish stock, and became skilful horsemen. They were long a terror to the whites and to surrounding tribes. The few hundred remaining live in villages under Brazilian rule. It is doubtful if this was the tribe or the same name known in the Chaco region in the 17th and 18th centuries. Also written Guaycurus, Guaycurús, Guaycurúes, etc.

Guaycuru stock (gwī-kō-rō' stok), sometimes called the Chaco stock. A well-defined group of South American Indian tribes, nearly all of which inhabit the region west of the river Paraguay, between 19° and 28° S. lat., known as the Gran Chaco. It includes the Guaycurus, Mocobis, Tobas, the Abipones, and many others, all of more or less nomadic habit, warlike, and living largely by game. The Jesuit missionaries could make little impression on them, and a few only, out of weakness, have submitted to white influence. They resemble North American Indians in their coppery color. The different tribes speak closely allied languages.

Guaymas (gwī'mäs). [Prob. an Opata name.] A tribe, now extinct (as such), formerly living on the coast of the Gulf of California in Sonora. From them the town of Guaymas derives its name. The Guaymas were almost exterminated, in the second half of the 18th century, by the Seris. Their language is said to be a dialect of the Pima.

Guaymas. A seaport in the state of Sonora, Mexico, situated on the Gulf of California in lat. 27° 56′ N., long. 110° 36′ W. Population, about 5,500.

Guaynos (gwī'nōs). An ancient Indian tribe of northwestern South America, south of the Orinoco, from whom the great region called Guiana is said to have derived its name. The Guinaos of the upper Orinoco, or the Guianaus of British Guiana (both of Arawak stock), may be their descendants.

Guayra (gwī-rä' or gwī'ra). The name given by the British engineers of Paraguay to the region bordering the upper Paraná. The name was loosely applied, sometimes including both sides of the river above the great fall at other times denoting the region to the east and southeast only, including the disputed territory of Missiones, and portions of Paraná, Santa Catharina, and Rio Grande do Sul in Brazil and of Corrientes in Argentina. Until the 19th century it was legally and practically ruled in the government of Paraguay, and the Jesuits had important missions there.

Guayra, La. See La Guayra.

Guayra Cataract. See Sete Quedas.

Gubbio (gōb'bē-ō). A cathedral city in the province of Perugia, Italy, at the foot of Monte Calvo 20 miles north-northeast of Perugia: the ancient Iguvium or Eugubium. It has manufactures of majolica. The Eugubine Tables (which see) are here, and other Umbrian antiquities; and there are various remains of antiquity in the neighborhood. The Palazzo dei Consoli is a building of the early 14th century, one of the most massive examples of Italian medieval civic construction. With its tower, and its battlements, it recalls the Florentine Palazzo Vecchio. This Umbrian town was destroyed by the Goths. It was independent in the middle ages. Population, about 5,000.

Guben (gō'ben). A town in the province of Brandenburg, Prussia, situated at the confluence of the Lubis with the Neisse, about 26 miles south-southeast of Frankfort-on-the-Oder. Population (1890), commune, 29,328.

Gubitz (gō'bits), Friedrich Wilhelm. Born at Leipsic, Feb. 27, 1786; died at Berlin, June 5, 1870. A German journalist, author, and artist. He edited and illustrated the "Deutscher Volkskalender" (1835–69), etc.

Gucumatz (gö-kö-mäts'). [Quiche, 'feathered serpent,' or 'serpent clothed in green and blue.'] In the Quiche mythology of the Popul Vuh, the title of the first creator of all things.

Gudbrandsdal (gō'brāns-dāl). The valley of the Laagen, in central Norway, about lat. 61°.

Gude (gō'de). Hans Frederik. Born at Christiania, March 13, 1825. A Norwegian landscape-painter, a pupil of Achenbach and Schirmer at the Academy of Düsseldorf, and since 1880 a successful teacher of his art in Berlin.

Gudea (gö-dā'ä). One of the earliest Babylonian kings, or, as they were styled in the oldest epoch of Babylonian history, patesi, i. e. priest-king or viceroy. Gudea is mentioned as such a patesi of Sirpula or Sirgurla. Eight statues and other monuments of him have been found. The exact date of his reign has not been ascertained (possibly about 3000 B. C., or, according to some, 5000 B. C.).

Gudin (gü-dañ'), Théodore. Born at Paris, Aug. 15, 1802; died at Boulogne-sur-Seine, France, April 11, 1880. A French painter of marines and landscapes.

Gudrun (göd-drön', or Kudrun (kö-drön'). [Mhg. Kudrun, NHG. Gudrun.] The heroine of a Middle High German epic poem, after the "Nibelungenlied" the most important in the early literature of Germany. Gudrun is the daughter of King Hetel of Hegelingen. The scene of action is principally the coast region of the North Sea and Normandy. The poem, written in the 13th century by an unknown author in Austria or Bavaria.

Guebers, or Ghebers (ge'bėrz), or Gabers, or Ghavers (ga'vėrz), or Gebirs (ge-bėrz'). [Commonly derived from the Arabic kafir, infidel ('ginour,' the word applied by Mohammedans to all non-Mohammedans, supposed to have been applied to this sect by their Arab conquerors in the 7th century). From its occurrence in the Talmud as Chebar, and in Origen as Kabar, others believe it to be an ancient proper name from some tribe or locality.] A Mohammedan name of the followers of Zoroaster, otherwise known as Atesh-parastan ('fire-worshippers'), Mahjusan (from their priests the magii), and Parsee, or people of Pars or Fars (Persia). See Parsees.

Guébriant (gā-brē-oñ'), Jean Baptiste Budes, Comte de. Born at Plessis-Budes, Brittany, Feb. 2, 1602; died at Rottweil, Swabia, Nov. 24, 1643. A French marshal. He served in Germany from 1630, and defeated the Duke of Weimar. On the death of Bernhard hereditended, Oct. 9, 1638, a treaty with the officers of the late duke's army, whereby the army entered the service of France. He defeated and captured the imperialist general Lamboy at Kempten June 17, 1642, a service for which he was created a marshal of France. He captured Rottweil Nov. 19, 1643, when he was mortally wounded.

Guebwiller. See Gebweiler.

Guelderland, Guelders. See Gelderland.

Guelfs, or Guelphs (gwelfs). [From Guelfo, lt. form of Welf, a personal name.] The papal and popular party of Italy in the middle ages; opposed to the Ghibellines, the imperial and aristocratic party. The Welfs (Guelfs) were a powerful family in Germany, so called from Welf I. in the time of Charlemagne. His descendants, several of whom bore the same name, held great possessions in Italy; through intermarriages with the Estensi (dukes of Bavaria, Saxony, and Carinthia) and founded the princely house of Brunswick and Hanover, to which the present royal family of England belongs. The names Welf and Waiblingen (now lt. and Ghibelline) are alleged to have been first used as war-cries at the battle of Weinsberg in 1140, fought and lost by Welf VI. against the Hohenstaufen emperor Conrad III. The contest soon expanded in many, but was taken up on other grounds in Italy, over which the emperors claimed supreme power; and the names were applied to designate butterly antagonistic parties there till the end of the 15th century. See Ghibellines.

An Italian Benedictine monk. He is celebrated for his reforms in musical notation. He went to Rome at the invitation of Pope Benedict VIII., probably in 1022, and again in the time of Pope John XIX., to explain his method of teaching music. He seems to have written most of his works at the monastery of Pomposa in the duchy of Ferrara, where he continued to give time to teaching as resorted to the monks and choir-boys. He was afterward made abbot of the monastery of Santa Croce at Avellano, near Arezzo, where he is believed to have died. Guido has been credited with a number of inventions and discoveries, none of which obviously cannot have been his. He wrote the "Micrologus," the "Antiphonarium," "De artificio novi cantus," "De divisione monochordi secundum Boetium," and other works on musical subjects.

It appears certain that Guido invented the principle upon which the construction of the stave is based, and the Land C clefs; but that he did not invent the complete 4-lined stave itself. There is strong reason to believe that he invented the Hexachord, Solmisation, and the Harmonic Hand; and was, at least, not forbidden principles upon which these inventions were based. Finally, it is certain that he was not the first to extend the Scale downwards to Γ ut; that he neither invented Diaphonia, Discant, Organum, nor Counterpoint; and that he did not hit him with the invention of the Monochord and the Polyplectrum is absurd. Grove, Dict. Music, IV. 661.

Guillotin (gē-yō-tan'), Joseph Ignace. Born at Saintes, France, May 28, 1738; died at Paris, March 26, 1814. A French physician, wrongly regarded as the inventor of the guillotine. As deputy to the Constituent Assembly, 1789, he proposed that all capital punishment should be by decapitation, a privilege till then reserved for the nobility, and suggested that decapitation could be most quickly and humanely performed by a machine. The device actually adopted as a result of this suggestion was prepared by a German mechanic named Schmidt under the direction of Dr. Antoine Louis, perpetual secretary of the Academy of Surgery, and was first used April 25, 1792, for the execution of a highwayman named Pelletier. The machine was first named louisson or louisette, but after a while Guillotin's name was attached to it. Guise, Cardinals and Dukes of. See Lorraine.

Guise, Duchy of. A former duchy of northeastern France, which took its name from the town of Guise, and corresponded to the northern part of the department of Aisne. It was situated in the government of Picardy. Formerly it was a county. It was famous in the 16th and 17th centuries as a duchy in the hands of the Guise family, a branch of the house of Lorraine.

Guise (gīz), Martin. Died Jan. 21, 1829. An English naval officer who in 1818 entered the service of Chile, under Cochrane, as captain. He did efficient service in the war for independence, and on the retirement of Cochrane (1825) was appointed to organize the navy of Peru. On making the pact of 1828 he forced the surrender of the last Spanish post, Callao Castle, Jan. 19, 1826. Admiral Guise was killed in the attack on Guayaquil.

Guiteau (gē-tō'), Charles. Born about 1840; hanged at Washington, June 30, 1882. An American assassin. He was a pettifogging lawyer of French-Canadian descent at Chicago, and on Garfield's election to the presidency went to Washington to seek for office. An American consul at Marseilles, which he did not obtain. Excited by this failure, and by the political conflict between Garfield and Roscoe Conkling, he shot the President fatally at Washington, July 2, 1881.

Guizot (gē-zō' or güe-zō'), Madame (Élisabeth Charlotte Pauline de Meulan). Born at Paris, Nov. 2, 1773; died at Paris, Aug. 1, 1827. A French writer, first wife of F. P. G. Guizot, whom she married in 1812. She wrote "Éducation domestique, ou lettres de famille sur l'éducation" (1826), etc.

Guizot, François Pierre Guillaume. Born at Nîmes, Oct. 4, 1787; died at Val-Richer, in Normandy, Sept. 12, 1874. A distinguished French historian and statesman. At the age of 12 he left his native city for Geneva, and in 1806 he took up the study of law in Paris. In 1812 he was appointed assistant professor of literature, and soon thereafter was called to the new chair of modern history. His early publications are "Du gouvernement représentatif et de l'état actuel de la France" (1816), "Des conspirations et de la justice politique (1821), "Des moyens de gouvernement et d'opposition dans l'état actuel de la France" (1821), "De la peine de mort en matière politique" (1822), etc. These pamphlets brought about his resignation from his professorship. Devoting himself exclusively to historical research, he published "Collection des mémoires relatifs à la révolution d'Angleterre," "Collection des mémoires relatifs à l'histoire de France," "Histoire de la révolution d'Angleterre depuis l'avènement de Charles I. jusqu'à la restauration de Charles II.," etc. In 1828 he was called to the chair of history in Paris, and as professor at the Sorbonne delivered several courses of lectures which appeared under the titles "Cours d'histoire moderne," "Histoire générale de la civilisation en Europe," and "Histoire générale de la civilisation en France." After the revolution of July, 1830, he became minister of the interior, and, with the exception of a few months, held office almost uninterruptedly. Ambassador to England remained almost continuously minister in various capacities until he fell from power, Feb. 23, 1848, on the eve of the February revolution. Guizot was prime minister for the 8 years preceding his downfall, but had made himself so unpopular that he failed to be elected to the National Assembly of 1848. The latter part of his life was spent in retirement. Besides the works already mentioned, Guizot translated Shakspere, and published "Washington" (1851), "De la démocratie en France" (1849), "Discours sur l'histoire de la révolution d'Angleterre" (1850), "Méditations et études morales" (1851), "L'Amour dans le mariage" (1855), "Guillaume le Conquérant et la fondation de l'unité anglaise" (1857), "Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de mon temps" (1858–68), "L'Église et la société chrétienne en 1861" (1861), "Discours académiques" (1861), "Trois gouvernements" (1863), "Histoire parlementaire de France" (1863), "Méditations sur l'essence de la religion chrétienne" (1864), "Méditations sur l'état actuel de la religion chrétienne" (1865), "Méditations biographiques et littéraires" (1868), "La France et la Prusse responsables devant l'Europe" (1868), "Méditations sur la religion chrétienne dans ses rapports avec l'état actuel des sociétés et des esprits" (1868), "Mélanges politiques et historiques" (1869), "Le duc de Broglie" (1872), "Les vies de quatre grands chrétiens français, Saint-Louis, Calvin" (1873, incomplete), and "Histoire de France racontée à mes petits-enfants" (1870–75).

Gula (gö'lä). In Assyro-Babylonian mythology, the name of the wife of Adar, the god of war and the chase. She is styled "the great lady" who presides over life and death. Those who break contracts are threatened with her vengeance. Nebuchadnezzar dedicated to her two temples at Babylon and three at Borsippa.

Gulf Stream, The. An oceanic current which first becomes apparent near the north coast of Cuba, whence it advances eastward to the Bahamas, then, turning northward, follows the Atlantic coast with a velocity of from 2 to 5 miles an hour, gradually expanding in breadth and diminishing in depth, but distinctly perceived beyond the eastern edge of Newfoundland as far as about long. 30° W. Its average breadth from Bermuda to the neighborhood of Nova Scotia is from 300 to 400 miles. Its comparatively high temperature (10 to 20 degrees above that of the surrounding ocean), rapid motion, and deep-blue color make the Gulf Stream a most remarkable phenomenon, and even more interesting than the Kuro Sivo, the corresponding current on the Asiatic coast of the Pacific Ocean. The Gulf Stream exerts a most important influence in moderating the climate of France, the British Isles, and other parts of western Europe. The distance to which the influence of the Gulf Stream is felt in a northeasterly direction has been the subject of much discussion among thalassographers. It seems pretty clearly established, however, that a considerable portion of the effect produced upon the climate of northern Europe which was formerly ascribed exclusively to the Gulf Stream is in reality due to a current coming from the Antilles (the Antilles Stream), which joins the Gulf Stream to the north of the Bahamas.

Gülhané. See Abdul-Medjid.

Gulistan (gö-lis-tan'). [Pers., 'the rose-garden.'] The most celebrated and finished work of the Persian poet Sadi. It is a kind of moral work in verse and prose, consisting of 8 chapters on kings, derishes, contentment, taciturnity, love and youth, decrepitude and old age, education, and the duties of society, the whole interwoven with stories, maxims, philosophical sentences, and puns.

Gull (gul), Sir William Whitney. Born at Colchester, Dec. 31, 1816; died Jan. 29, 1890. A noted English physician, appointed physician extraordinary to the queen in 1872 (ordinary in 1887).

Gullians (gul'ianz). A name sometimes given to the followers of William III. of England.

Gulliver, Lemuel. The ostensible recounter of "Gulliver's Travels."

Gulliver's (gul'i-vèrz) Travels. A social and political prose satire, in the form of a book of travels, written by Jonathan Swift, and published in 1726. It consists of a voyage to Lilliput, to Brobdingnag, to Laputa, and to the country of the Houyhnhnms. Lemuel Gulliver is an honest, blunt English sailor.

"Gulliver's Travels" owes most of its external shape to the "Vera Historia" of Lucian, itself a travesty of lost works on geography. The French poet Cyrano de Bergerac (1620–1655) had written a "Voyage à la lune" and a "Histoire comique des états et empires du soleil," from which Fontenelle had borrowed some hints. Several slight points which Swift used he is said to have taken from a tract by Francis Godwin, Bishop of Llandaff. There can be no doubt, moreover, that the particular narrative manner of Defoe, whose "Robinson Crusoe" had appeared in 1719, produced an effect upon Swift. These critical speculations, however, are rather curious than essential. Swift, always among the most original of writers is nowhere more thoroughly himself than in his enchanting romance of Lemuel Gulliver. Whether we read it, as children do, for the story, or as historians, for the political allusions, or as men of the world, for the satire and philosophy, we have to acknowledge that it is one of the wonderful and unique books of the world's literature.

Gosse, Hist. Eng. Lit., p. 160.

Gull's Hornbook, The. A book by Thomas Dekker, published in 1609. It gives a graphic description of the manners of Jacobean gallants. The tract is to some extent modeled on Dedekind's "Grobianus." It is Dekker's best-known work.

Gundobad (gun'dō-bad), or, erroneously, Gundebald (gun'de-bald). Died 516. King of the Burgundians 473–516. He became a patrician of Rome in 473, and in the following year succeeded his father Gundioch as king of the Burgundians, dividing the sovereignty with his brothers Godegisel, Chilperic, and Godomar I. In 500 he was defeated by Chlodwig (Clovis), king of the Franks, through the treachery of Godegisel, and was expelled from his kingdom. He subsequently recovered his throne, deposed Godegisel and, as his two other brothers had in the mean time died, reunited the Burgundian dominions under his sway. He formed an alliance with Chlodwig, and, although an Arian, educated his sons Sigismund and Godomar II. in the Roman Catholic religion, which was the faith of his subjects. He drew up a code of laws, which was named, after him, “Lex Gundobada.”

Gunduk. See Gandak.

Gundulf (gun'dulf), L. Gundolphus (gun-dol'fus). Born in the diocese of Rouen about 1024: died March 8, 1108. A Norman prelate. In 1059 he became a monk in the abbey of Bec, where he became a friend of Anselm and of Lanfranc, archbishop of Canterbury, by whose assistance he was elevated to the see of Rochester, March 19, 1077. He was the architect of the cathedral of Rochester (some of his work still exists), of a castle at Rochester, of St. Leonard’s Tower and a nunnery at Malling, and of the White Tower in London Tower.

Gunning (gun'ing), Elizabeth, Duchess of Hamilton and afterward of Argyll. Born in 1734: died May 20, 1790. A celebrated beauty. She married James, fifth duke of Hamilton, in 1752, and in 1759 she married John Campbell, marquis of Lorne, afterward fifth duke of Argyll. Compare Gunning, Maria.

Gunning, Maria, Countess of Coventry. Born in 1733: died Oct. 1, 1760. A celebrated beauty, daughter of John Gunning of Castle Coote, County Roscommon, Ireland. She and her sister Elizabeth went to London in 1751, and were at once pronounced to be “the handsomest women alive. They were followed by crowds wherever they went, and Maria was the heroine of a mobbed one evening in Hyde Park. The king gave her a guard to protect her, and she once walked in the park for two hours with 2 sergeants of the guard before her and 2 others following her. In 1752 she married George William, sixth earl of Coventry. “The beautiful Misses Gunning” were paintedin number of times, and there are many engravings from these portraits.

Gunning, Mrs. (Susannah Minifie). Born in 1740 (?): died at London, Aug. 28, 1800. An English novelist. She married John Gunning, the brother of the beautiful Gunning sisters. He was colonel of the 65th regiment of foot and lieutenant-general. He had one daughter, Elizabeth, and owing to her flirtations (in which her mother took her part) she and her mother left his house. Many squibs and satires were written on the ensuing complication, which Walpole called “the Gunningiad.” Both Susannah Gunning and her daughter wrote a number of novels. The latter married Major James Plunkett, and died in Suffolk, July 20, 1823.

Gunter (gun'tėr). Edmund. Born in Hertfordshire, England, 1581: died at Gresham College, London, Dec. 10, 1626. An English mathematician, professor of astronomy in Gresham College from 1619. He invented the chain, line, quadrant, and scale that are named from him “Gunter’s chain,” etc.

Henry Briggs was his colleague for a year; and their association doubtless led to Gunter’s “Canon Triangulorum; or, Table of Artificial Sines and Tangents, to a radius of 100,000,000 parts to each minute of the Quadrant,” 1620. This was the first table of its kind published, and did for sines and tangents what Briggs did for natural numbers. In these tables Gunter applied to navigation and other branches of mathematics his admirable rule “The Gunter,” on which were inscribed the logarithmic lines for numbers, sines, and tangents of arches; and he showed how to take a back observation by the cross-staff, whereby the error arising from the eccentricity of the eyes is avoided. . . . He was the first who used the words cosine, cotangent, etc., . . . and also introduced the use of arithmetical complements into the logarithmical arithmetic (Briggs, Arith. Log., cap. L.). De Morgan (Arith. Books, xxv.) favors Gunter’s claim to the invention of the decimal sepa rator.

Diet. Nat. Biog.

He was an associate of Mrs. Fry in prison reform, and of Clarkson and Wilberforce in the anti-slavery movement. He wrote “Notes on Prison Discipline” (1819), “Evidences, etc., of Christianity” (1825), etc.

Gurth (gerth). In Sir Walter Scott’s novel “Ivanhoe,” a swineherd and bondsman of Cedric.

Gurton, Gammer. See Gammer Gurton’s Needle.

Gurwal, or Gurwhal. See Garhwal.

Gushington (gush'ing-ton), Angelina. The nom de plume of Charles Wallwyn Radcliffe Cooke.

Gushington, Impulsia. The nom de plume of Helena Selina Sheridan, Lady Dufferin.

Gusmão (gōōs-mouⁿ'), Alexandre de. Born in Santos, Brazil, 1695: died at Lisbon, Portugal, Dec. 31, 1753. A Portuguese statesman. Most of his life was passed in Europe, where he was an influential minister under several Portuguese kings. The treaty of 1750, which settled the limits of the Spanish and Portuguese possessions in America by uti possidetis, was due mainly to him.

Güssfeldt (güs'felt), Paul. Born at Berlin, Oct. 14, 1840. A German scientific traveler. In 1873 he led a great scientific expedition to West Africa. His associates were Dr. Falkenstein, Soyaux, Linder, Pechuel-Loesche, and Dr. Bastian. Chinchonilo, on the Chibango River, 20 miles south of Benguela, was fixed upon as coast-station and headquarters. The attempt to explore the far interior failed, but a rich harvest of scientific collections and observations was brought back in 1875 and published in journals as well as in “Im Innern Afrikas” (Leipsic, 1879). In 1876 Güssfeldt explored the eastern desert of Egypt in company with Dr. Schweinfurth. His journeys in the Andes of Brazil and in the Bolivian highland (1882–83) resulted in several important discoveries. On his return to Germany he became general secretary of the Berlin Geographical Society.

Gustavus (gus-tā'vus or gus-tā'vus) I., or Gustavus Vasa (vā'sä). [NL. Gustavus, F. Gustave, It. Gustavo, G. Gustav, Sw. Gustaf, Dan. Gustav.] Born at Lindholmen, Upland, Sweden, May 12, 1496: died at Stockholm, Sept. 29, 1560. King of Sweden 1523–60. He was the son of Erik Johansson (hence called Gustavus Eriksson) of the house of Vasa, and was descended on the side of his mother from that of Sture, two of the most influential noble families in Sweden. He received a careful education, chiefly at the court of his kinsman Sten Sture the younger, the latter of whom he served against the Danes at the battle of Brunnkyrka in 1518. In the negotiations which followed this Swedish victory he was sent as a hostage to Christian II. of Denmark, by whom he was treacherously carried off to Denmark. He escaped in 1519, and on the massacre of Stockholm, in which 90 of the leading men of Sweden, including the father of Gustavus, were executed by Christian II., headed a revolt of the Dalecarlians in 1520, and captured Stockholm in 1523, in which year at the Strengnas diet he was elected (Aug. 6) as king of Sweden by the Kalmar union with Denmark. He favored the Reformation in opposition to the Roman Catholic clergy, who had supported the late Danish king, Christian II., and in 1527, at the Diet of Westerås, procured the passage of measures placing the lands of the bishops at his disposal, and granting the liberty of preaching the Reformed faith.

Gustavus II. Adolphus. Born at Stockholm, Dec. 19, 1594: died Nov. 16, 1632. King of Sweden 1611–32, son of Charles IX. and Christina of Holstein, and grandson of Gustavus I. He inherited at his accession three wars from the previous reign, namely, with Denmark, Russia, and Poland. He concluded peace with Denmark at Knared, Jan. 20, 1613; compelled Russia to cede Kexholm Ladoga and Ingermanland at Stolbova, March 4, 1617; and, through the mediation of Richelieu, concluded an armistice of two years with Poland, Sept. 26, 1629, with a view to invading Germany, where the recent victories of the emperor over the Protestant princes under Christian IV. of Denmark threatened both France and Sweden, the former by the increase of the power of the house of Austria, and the latter by the destruction of the equilibrium between Protestantism and Roman Catholicism in the north of Europe. Leaving the conduct of the government in the hands of his chancellor, Axel Oxenstierna, he landed in Pomerania with 15,000 men, July 4, 1630, concluded a formal treaty of alliance with France at Barwalde in Jan., 1631; defeated Tilly at Leipsic, Sept. 17, 1631; and gained the victory of Lutzen over Wallenstein, Nov. 16, 1632, but fell in the battle.

Gustavus III. Born at Stockholm, Jan. 24, 1746; died at Stockholm, March 29, 1792. King of Sweden 1771-92, son of Adolphus Frederick. He crushed the power of the royal council, consisting of nobles, by a coup d'état in 1772, which reduced it from the position of a coexecutive to that of an advisory committee. He carried on war with Russia 1788-90, and was humiliated as the result of a conspiracy among the nobles.

Gustavus IV. Adolphus, Born Nov. 1, 1778; died at St.-Gall, Switzerland, Feb. 7, 1837. King of Sweden 1792-1809, son of Gustavus III. Contrary to the interests of his country, he bitterly opposed Napoleon, and in 1805 became involved in war with Russia, to which he lost Finland, and was deposed by a military conspiracy.

Gustavus Adolphus Union. [G. Evangelischer Verein der Gustav-Adolf-Stiftung.] A union of various Protestant churches in Germany, for the purpose of assisting Protestants in Roman Catholic countries, formed after the bicentennial celebration of the battle of Lützen (1832).

Güstrow (güs'trov). A town in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Germany, situated on the Nebel in lat. 53° 48′ N., long. 12° 11′ E. It has a trade in wool, and contains a cathedral and an ancient ducal castle. Population (1890), 14,566.

Gutenberg (gö'ten-berg), Johannes or Henne (originally Gensfleisch). Born at Mainz about 1400; died about 1468. The inventor of printing. His claim to this invention has been much disputed. (See Coster.) He was the son of Friele Gensfleisch and Else Gutenberg, and took his mother's name. In 1420 his father was exiled, and various legal proceedings growing out of this show that Gutenberg was in Strasburg in 1434. In 1436 he was sued before the court at Strasburg for breach of promise of marriage. His claim to be the inventor of printing rests mainly on a legal decision rendered at Strasburg (see Laurens Janszoon), from which it appears that he entered into partnership with certain persons to carry on various secret operations, one of which involved the use of a press with an attachment conjectured to have been a type-mold. In 1450 he formed a partnership with Johann Fust, a moneylender, which terminated in 1455. Fust demanded payment of money loaned; in default of this, seized all of Gutenberg's type-and-stock and carried on the business himself, with Peter Schoeffer (later his son-in-law) as manager. Gutenberg continued his work with inferior tools.

He was a lawyer; deputy to several congresses; governor of Cundinamarca; and minister of the treasury 1857-61. In 1861, as a leader of the conservatives, he assumed executive power and attempted to defend Bogotá against the revolutionist Mosquera, but was defeated and for a time banished.

Gutium (gü'shi-um). See the extract.

> The northern plateau was inhabited by a mixture of uncultivated tribes at the earliest period of which we have any knowledge, and was known under the general name of Gutium or Guti (Kuta in Assyrian), first identified by Sir H. Rawlinson with the Goyim of Gen. xiv. 1. Gutium comprised the whole country which stretched from the Euphrates on the west to Media on the east; the land of Yatbi, with the mountain of Rowandûz, on which the ark of the Chaldean Noah was believed to have rested, being included within it. Sayce, Anc. Empires, p. 96.

Gutnic (göt'nik), or Gutnish. [G. Gutnisch.] The Swedish dialect of the island of Gotland in the Baltic. Old Gutnic is a sharply differentiated dialect of Old Swedish, preserved in runic inscriptions from the Viking age (700–1050) to the 16th century, and in several MSS. from the 14th century. With Swedish and Danish it forms the group specifically called East Norse.

Gutzkow (göts'kō), Karl. Born at Berlin, March 17, 1811: died at Frankfort-on-the-Main, Dec. 16, 1878. A German dramatist and author. He studied theology and philosophy at Berlin. In 1831 appeared his first work, "Forum der Journal litteratur." He then became a dramatic critic at Stuttgart, and afterward traveled abroad and lived for short periods in various places in Germany. In 1835 appeared "Wally, die Zweiflerin" (usually called "Wally"), which got him, on account of the religious views expressed, a three months' imprisonment at Mannheim. From 1847 to 1850 he lived in Dresden, dramatically, for the first time he had again been active as a journalist, and had written besides a number of critical works and essays. In 1852 he founded, in Dresden, a weekly journal. From 1860 to 1864 he was directing-editor of the Berlin "Deutsche Reform." Loss of health compelled him to relinquish this position in the latter year. Among his many novels are "Die Ritter vom Geiste" (1850-52), "Der Zauberer von Rom" (1858-1861), "Hohenschwangau" (1868), etc. His principal dramas are "Zopf und Schwert" ("Periwig and Sword," 1843), "Das Urbild des Tartüffe" ("The Original of Tartuffe," 1844), "Uriel Acosta" (1846), "Der Königslieutenant," ("The King's Lieutenant," 1849).

Guy, or Gui (gī or gē), or Guido (gwē'dō), of Lusignan (lü-zēn-yoñ'). [MI. Guido, F. Guy, It. Guido, Sp. Guido, G. and D. Guido.] Died 1194. King of Jerusalem. He was descended from an ancient reigning family in Poitou, and in 1180 married the Marchioness of Montferrat, Sibylla, daughter of Amalric (Amaury), king of Jerusalem. He succeeded to the throne in 1186 on the death of Baldwin V., the son of Sibylla and the Marquis of Montferrat. In 1187 he was conquered and imprisoned by Saladin, by whom he was released on renouncing his claim to the throne. This renunciation he subsequently disregarded, and in 1192 transferred his claim to the kingdom of Jerusalem to Richard I. of England in exchange for Cyprus, in which he became the founder of a new Frankish dynasty.

Guy of Warwick. A legendary hero of English romance. The legends concerning him seem to have been first put in shape by an Anglo-Norman poet of the 12th century. In the 14th century they were first considered authentic history by chroniclers. Peter Langtoft and Walter of Exeter wrote his history about 1308. Many poems as well as short ballads have been written upon the subject. His most popular feat was the killing of the giant Colbrand, a Danish champion, with whom he fought a duel to decide the war between Athelstan and the Danes who were besieging him at Winchester. He then returned to Warwick, where, finding himself known to her only as the Earl of Warwick, in right of whom he assumed the title. He resided near her castle as a hermit, and lived on the alms which, not knowing himself known to her, and she only discovered his identity when he sent her their wedding-ring, begging her to attend his death-bed. See Warbeck.

Guy (gī), Thomas. Born about 1645; died at London, Dec. 27, 1724. An English bookseller and philanthropist. He founded Guy's Hospital (London) in 1722, and endowed other charitable institutions.

Guzerat (in the Panjab). See Gujrat.

Guzman (göth-man'). Fernando Perez de, Born in 1405; died in 1470. A Spanish poet and chronicler. He served for a time at the council-board and in the army of John II., king of Castile, but eventually retired to private life and devoted himself to literature. His chief work is "Cronica del señor don Juan Segundo de este nombre, rey de Castilla," etc. (1668).

Guzman, Gonzalo Nuño de. Born at Portillo: died at Santiago de Cuba, Nov. 5, 1539. The second governor of Cuba. He was one of the conquerors of the island region of Santiago, and after the death of Velasquez became governor in April, 1527. Accused of his avarice and cruelty he was removed, Nov. 6, 1531, but again obtained the place and retained it until 1537.

Guzman (göth-man'), Joaquin Eufracio. Born in Costa Rica, 1801: died in Salvador about 1870. A Central American general and politician. He served under Malespin, and was vice-president in his administration, but declared against him in Feb., 1846, and assumed the executive office. He held out the term in 1848. Subsequently he was a leader of the liberals in the Salvadorian Congress.

Guzman, Luis Henriquez de. See Henriquez de Guzman.

Guzman, Nuño or Nuñez Beltran de. Born at Guadalajara, Spain, about 1487: died there, 1544. A Spanish lawyer and soldier. He was one encomendero at Puerto de Plata, Española. In 1526 he was appointed to seth and govern Panico, in northwestern Mexico; and by his encroachments on the territory of Cortés, and of Narvaez on the north, caused much trouble. In 1528 he was made president of the first audience of Mexico, virtually ruling the country until 1531. He did all he could to injure Cortés, and made himself hated by arbitrary acts and extortion. In 1530 he conquered the region on the Pacific coast long known as New Galicia. Guzman was deposed by a new audience, Dec., 1533, and was subsequently disgraced and heavily fined.

Guzman, Ruy Diaz de. Born in Paraguay, 1544: died after 1612. The first historian of Paraguay. The greater part of his life was spent in the province of Guayra, where he became military governor. His "Historia Argentina" describes the conquest of the Platine States, and brings the history of the colony down to 1575. The work was first published in the "Angelis Collection," 1836.

Guzman Blanco (blän'kō), Antonio. Born at Caracas, Feb. 29, 1828. A Venezuelan soldier and statesman. He was prominent in the federalist revolts 1859–63, and on the latter year became first vice-president under Falcon in 1863. The latter was deposed by a revolution in 1868. Guzman Blanco headed a successful counter-revolution in 1870, and Falcon having died became president. By successive reelections he retained the office until 1887, and his influence was strong under subsequent administrations until 1892.

Guzman de Alfarache. A romance by Mateo Aleman, named from its hero. It is "nearly of the same age as 'Don Quixote,' and of great genius, though it can hardly be ranked as a model or a work of imagination. It is a series of strong, realistic sketches, rather than a drily told, but accompanied by the most severe and sarcastic commentary. The satire, the wit, the eloquence and reasoning are of the most potent kind; but they are didactic rather than dramatic. They would suit a homily or a pasquinade as well [as] or better than a romance. Still there are in this extraordinary book occasional sketches of character and humorous descriptions to which it would be difficult to produce anything superior." Hazlitt.

As it has reached us, it is divided into two parts, the first of which was published at Madrid in 1599. Its hero, who supposed himself to be the son of a respectable but not very reputable Genoese merchant established at Seville, escapes, as a boy, from his mother, after his father's ruin and death, and plunges into the world upon adventure. He soon finds himself at Madrid, though not till he has passed through the hands of justice; and in that capital undergoes all sorts of suffering, serving as a scullion to a cook, and as a ragged errand-boy to whomsoever would employ him; until, seeing a good opportunity, he steals a large sum of money that had been intrusted to him, and escapes to Toledo, where he sets up for a gentleman. But there he becomes, in his turn, the victim of a cunning like his own; and, finding his money nearly gone, enlists for the Italian wars. His star is now on the wane. At Barcelona he again turns sharper and thief. At Genoa and Rome he sinks to the lowest condition of a street beggar. But a cardinal picks him up in the last city and makes him his page: a place in which, but for his bold frauds and tricks, he might long have thriven, and which at last he leaves in great distress, from losses at play, and enters the service of the French ambassador. Here the First Part ends. . . . In 1605 the genuine Second Part appeared. It begins with the life of Guzman in the house of the French ambassador at Rome, where he serves in some of the most dishonorable employments to which the great of that period degraded their mercenary dependents.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., III. 99.

Gwalior (gwä'lē-ōr). 1. A protected state of India, of irregular outline, lying between the Northwest Provinces on the northeast and the states of Rajputana on the west. It is ruled by the Sindhia dynasty: their forces were defeated in 1803 and 1843. Area, 25,855 square miles. Population (1891), 3,378,774.

2. The capital of the state of Gwalior, situated in lat. 26° 13′ N., long. 78° 10′ E. It is the seat of Jain and early Hindu antiquities, and is noted for its fortress. Population (1891), 104,085.

Gwamba (gwäm'bä). A Bantu tribe occupying the vast tract between Zululand and the Sabi River, mostly in Portuguese East Africa, but also represented in Transvaal. Scattered tribes are found as far north as Lake Nyassa, where they are called Batonga, which is the nickname given them by the Zulus. They call themselves Magwamba, and their language Shigwamba. This language differs more from Chuana and Suto than from Zulu. The Boers call them Knobnoses, because of their custom, now abandoned, of producing a string of fleshy knobs down their noses. A Swiss mission has been very successful in teaching these natives.

Gwendolen Harleth. See Harleth.

Gwilt (gwilt), Joseph. Born at Southwark, London, Jan. 11, 1784: died at Henley-on-Thames, Sept. 14, 1863. An English architect and archæologist. He published an "Encyclopædia of Architecture" (1842), etc.

Gwyn, or Gwinn (gwin), Nell or Eleanor. Born at Hereford (?), Feb. 2, 1650: died Nov. 13, 1687. An English actress, mistress of Charles II. There is little information as to her early life. Her first known appearance on the stage was in 1665. She was a great favorite with the public, as she was gay and sprightly and played piquant, hoistling parts. Her dancing was much admired. After various adventures with other lovers besides the king, she left the stage in 1682. The king retained his affection for her till his death. She had two children by him: Charles Beauclerk (1670) afterward Duke of St. Albans), and a second son, James (1671). Large sums of money, and Bestwood Park (Nottingham), Burford House (Windsor), and other gifts, were bestowed on her.

For tragedy she [Nell Gwyn] was unfitted: her stature was low, though her figure was graceful; and it was not till she assumed comic characters, stamped the smallest foot in England on the boards, and laughed with that peculiar laugh that in the excess of it her eyes almost disappeared, that she fairly carried away the town, and enslaved the hearts of city and of court. She spoke prologues and epilogues with wonderful effect, danced to perfection, and in her peculiar but not extensive line was, perhaps, unequalled for the natural feeling which she put into the parts most suited to her. She was so fierce or repartee that no one ventured to allude sneeringly to her antecedents. She was coarse, too, when the humour took her; could curse pretty strongly, if the house was not full; and was given, in common with the other ladies of the company, to loll about and talk loudly in the public boxes, when she was not engaged on the stage.

Gya. See Guiga.

Gyaman (gyä-män'). A Nigritic tribe of the Gold Coast, West Africa, situated north of Kumassi, and speaking a language of its own.

Gye (gī), Frederick. Born at London, 1809: died at Ditchley, Dec. 4, 1878. An English manager of opera. He undertook the management of Covent Garden in 1848, and retained it till 1877, when his son Ernest Gye assumed control. See Albani.

Gyergyo-Szent-Miklós (jer'jō-sent-mē'klōsh'). A town in the county of Csik, Transylvania, situated in lat. 46° 42′ N., long. 25° 33′ E. Population (1890), 6,104.

Gyges (jī'jēz). King of Lydia, a contemporary of the Assyrian king Asurbanipal (668–626 B. C.), and a founder of a new dynasty. Pressed by the Cimmerians, he invoked the help of Asurbanipal, and submitted to his supremacy. Afterward he allied himself with Psammetichus, king of Egypt, against Assyria, and seems to have fallen in one of the repeated attacks of the Cimmerians, who were no longer checked by the Assyrian power, in about 653. "According to the legend in Plato, Gyges, a herd-man of the king of Lydia, after a terrible storm and earthquake, saw near him a chasm in the earth, into which he descended and found a vast horse of brass, hollow and partly open, wherein lay a gigantic corpse with a golden ring. This ring he carried away, and discovered unexpectedly that it possessed the miraculous property of rendering him invisible at pleasure. Being sent on a message to the king Candaules, he made the magic ring available to his ambition: he first possessed himself of the person of the queen, and then with her aid assassinated the king, and finally seized the sceptre." Grote.

Gyidesdzo (gyēd-äsd-zō'). A tribe of North American Indians on Price Island, northwest of Millbank Sound, British Columbia. See Tsimshian.

Gyitgaata (gyēt-gä'ä-tä), or Kitkada, or Kitkaet. A tribe of North American Indians on Grenville Channel, British Columbia. Their name signifies 'people of the poles' (from their salmon-weirs). See Tsimshian.

Gyitksan (gyēt-ksän'), or Kitikshian. [From Kshian or Kashian, a settlement on Skeena River.] A tribe of North American Indians on upper Skeena River, British Columbia. See Nasqat.

Gymnopædiæ (jim-nō-pē'di-ē). [Gr. γυμνοπαιδία.] See the extract.

The feast of the Gymnopædiæ, or naked youths, was one of the most important at Sparta (Pausan. III. xi. § 7). It lasted several days, perhaps ten. It was less a religious festival than a great spectacle, wherein the grace and strength of the Spartan youth were exhibited to their admiring countrymen and to foreigners. The choi-i ceremonies were choral dances, in which wrestling and other gymnastic exercises were closely imitated, and which served to show the adroitness, activity, and bodily strength of the performers. These were chiefly Spartan youths, who danced naked in the forum, round the statues of Apollo, Diana, and Latona. Songs in celebration of the noble deeds performed by the youths, as the exploits of Thyrea and Thermopylæ, formed a portion of the proceedings at the festival.

Rawlinson, Herod., III. 451, note.

Gymnosophists (jim-nos'ō-fists). A sect of ancient Hindu philosophers who lived solitarily in the woods, wore little clothing, ate no flesh, renounced all bodily pleasures, and addicted themselves to mystical contemplation: so called by Greek writers. By some they are regarded as Brahman penitents; others include among them a set of Buddhist ascetics, the Shamans.

Gythium (ji-thi'um or jith'i-um). [Gr. Θήϐιον.] In ancient geography, a seaport of Laconia, Greece, situated on the Gulf of Laconia in lat. 36° 46′ N., long. 22° 34′ E., near the modern Marathonisi.

Gyula (jö'lo). The capital of the county of Békés, Hungary, situated on the White Körös in lat. 46° 38′ N., long. 21° 17′ E. Population (1890), 19,991.

Haanen (hä'nen), Remi van. Born at Oosterhout, Brabant, Jan. 5, 1812. A Dutch landscape-painter.

Haarlem, or Harlem (härʹlem). [D. Haarlem (formerly Haerlem, Harlem), OD. Hardem, ML. Harlemum.] The capital of the province of North Holland, Netherlands, on the Spaarne 4 miles from the North Sea, and 11 miles west of Amsterdam. It has various manufactures, and is especially celebrated for its flower-gardens. The Groote Kerk (or St. Bavo) is an impressive cruciform structure of the 15th century. The tower is 255 feet high. The interior possesses a brass choir-screen and fine carved stalls and pulpit. The organ, built in 1738, is famous as one of the finest existing. Haarlem was formerly the residence of the Counts of Holland. It was seized by the insurgent peasants in 1492; was invested by the Spaniards in Dec., 1572; surrendered in July, 1573; and was retaken by William of Orange in 1577. It was an art center in the 17th century. Population (1889), 50,247.

Haarlemmer Polder (härʹlem-mer pōlʹder). A plain in the province of North Holland, Netherlands, between Haarlem, Amsterdam, and Leyden. It was formerly the Haarlemmer Meer or Lake, 18 miles in length, formed in the 16th century and communicating with the Y and the Old Rhine. This was drained in 1836-53. Population of the district, about 10,000.

Haas (hās). Johannes Hubertus Leonardus de. Born at Heidel, North Brabant, March 25, 1832: died at Brussels, Aug. 16, 1880. A noted animal-painter. He was a pupil of Van Os at Haarlem, and went to Brussels in 1857. His "Trio of Donkeys" is at the Liebert Gallery; "Cattle on the Rhine," "Cows at Pasture," and "Three Comrades" at the National Gallery, Berlin; "Pasture" at the Brussels Museum; and "Cattle" at the Kunsthalle, Hamburg.

Haase (hāʹze), Friedrich. Born at Berlin, Nov. 1, 1826. A German actor. He first appeared on the stage at Weimar in 1846, and played successively at Potsdam, Berlin, Prague, Karlsruhe, Munich, Frankfort, and elsewhere. He visited America in 1867 and 1882-83. He is one of the most popular of German actors.

Hababˈ (ha-baibʹ). An African tribe wandering as nomadic herdsmen over the pasture-lands northwest of Massowah, between the Bogos and the Beni Amer. In physical appearance they and the Beni Amer show more affinity with the Cushitic Bedja or Bisharin; but their dialects belong to the same cluster as Tigre and Amharic, the base of which is Semitic. In religion the Hababs are said to be now Mohammedan, although within recent times they still made a profession of Ethiopic Christianity. See Tore.

Habakkuk (ha-bakʹuk or habʹa-kuk). [Cf. Assyr. ḫambuqâqu, name of a plant.] A Hebrew prophet. Nothing authentic of his life is known, and he therefore has become the subject of many legends. Thus, in the apocryphal book "Bel and the Dragon," he is carried through the air by an angel from Judea to Babylon to feed Daniel. The book of his prophecies, consisting of 3 chapters, holds the eighth place among the minor prophets. The first two chapters bear on the wickedness reigning in the country and the growing power of the Chaldeans; the third chapter is a lyric ode representing God as appearing in judgment. Habakkuk exhibits poetic genius of high order. His prophecy is constructed dramatically in the form of a dialogue between himself and Jehovah. The lyric ode ranks, for sublimity of poetic conception, picturesqueness of imagery, and splendor of diction, with the highest which Hebrew poetry has produced. He prophesied most probably in the reign of Jehoiakim (608-598 B. C.).

Habor (häʹbôr). A river mentioned with Gozan in connection with the settlement of the deported ten tribes in Assyria (2 Ki. xvii. 1). Its former identification with the Chebar has been generally given up. It is, no doubt, identical with the Aborrhas, or Chaboras, of classical writers, still bearing the name Khabour, which falls into the Euphrates near Circesium. The name occurs as Habur in the cuneiform inscriptions.

Haco. See Hakon.

Hadad (hāʹdad). A Syrian deity. The name is applied in the Bible to several persons. See Ben-hadad.

> Hadad occupied a higher position than Saul. He was, as I have said, the supreme Baal or Sun-god, whose worship extended southward from Carchemish to Edom and Palestine. At Damascus he was adored under the Assyrian name of Rimmon, and Zechariah (xii. 11) alludes to the cult of the compound Hadad-Rimmon in the close neighbourhood of the great Canaanitish fortress of Megiddo. Coins bear the name of Abd-Hadad, "the servant of Hadad," who reigned in the fourth century at Hierapolis, the later successor of Carchemish; and, under the abbreviated form of Dada, Shalmaneser speaks of "the god Dada of Aleppo" (Khalman).

> Sayce, Anc. Babylonians, p. 55.

Hadad-rimmon (häʹ dad-rimʹ on). A place mentioned in Zech. xii. 11 as situated in the valley of Megiddo, where a lamentation took place. The lamentation is referred by some to the fall of Josiah in the battle with Necho of Egypt near Megiddo (609 B. C.), and Hadad-rimmon is then taken as a place identified with the modern village Rummaneh, south of Lejun, which is considered as representing the ancient Megiddo. By others the lamentation of Hadad-rimmon is explained to mean the rites connected with three Syrian divinities similar to the mourning over the death of Adonis in Phenicia and elsewhere.

Hadai (hāʹdī), or Adaize (ā-dīzʹ). A tribe of the Caddo Confederacy of North American Indians. See Caddo.

Haddington (hadʹing-ton), or East Lothian (est lōʹthi-an). A maritime county of Scotland, bounded by the Firth of Forth and the North Sea on the north, Berwick on the southeast and south, and Edinburgh on the west. Area, 271 square miles. Population (1891), 37,485.

Hades (hāʹdēz). [Gr. Ἅιδης or Ἀΐδης.] 1. In Greek mythology: (a) The lord of the lower world, a brother of Zeus, and the husband of Persephone (Proserpine). He reigned in a splendid palace, and, besides his function of governing the shades of the departed, he was the giver to mortals of all treasures derived from the earth. In art he was represented in a form kindred to that of Zeus and that of Poseidon, and bearing the staff or scepter of authority, usually in company with Persephone. As the god of wealth he was also called by the Greeks Pluto; and he is the same as the Roman Dis, Orcus, or Tartarus. (b) The invisible lower or subterranean world in which dwelt the spirits of all the dead; the abode of the departed. The souls in Hades were believed to carry on there a counterpart of their material existence: those of the righteous without discomfort, amid the pale sweet blooms of asphodel, or even in pleasure, in the Elysian Fields; and those of the wicked amid various torments. The lower world was surrounded by fiery and pestilential rivers, and the solitary approach was guarded by the monstrous three-headed dog Cerberus to prevent the shades from escaping to the upper world.

2. In the Greek New Testament and in the revised English version, indefinitely, the state or abode of the dead: often taken as equivalent to purgatory, the intermediate state of the dead, or to hell.

Hading (ä-dañʹ), Jane Alfrédine Tréfouret, known as Jane Hading. Born at Marseilles, Nov. 25, 1859. A noted French actress. She made her first appearance, when only 3 years old, as little Blanche in "Le bossu." This part was usually represented by a doll. From the time she was 14 years old she played a variety of parts, at first in operetta, until finally, in 1885, she made her appearance at the Gymnase in Paris as an exponent of high comedy.

Hadrian (Popes). See Adrian.

Hadrian (hā'dri-an), sometimes Adrian (Publius Ælius Hadrianus). Born at Rome, Jan. 24, 76 A. D.: died at Baiæ, Italy, July 10, 138. Roman emperor 117–138, nephew of Trajan whom he succeeded. Renouncing the policy of conquest, he abandoned the new provinces of Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Assyria, and established the Euphrates as the eastern boundary of the empire. In 119 he began a progress through the provinces, in the course of which he began the construction of the wall that bears his name against the Picts and Scots in Britain, and from which he returned about 131. He promulgated the "Edictum Perpetuum," a collection of the edicts of the prætors by Salvius Julianus, in 129. In 132 he was occasioned among the Jews by the planting of the Roman colony of Ælia Capitolina on the site of Jerusalem, which was suppressed in 135.

Hadrian's Villa. An assemblage of ancient ruins, near Tivoli, perhaps the most impressive in Italy. It included the Greek and Latin theaters, so called, an odeum, thermæ, a stadium, a palace, several temples, pigeon-hole structures for guards and attendants, and many subsidiary buildings and devices. Of most of these there are extensive remains; and here were found many of the fine statues now in Roman museums.

Hadrian's Wall. A wall of defense for the Roman province of Britain, constructed by Hadrian between the Solway Firth and the mouth of the Tyne.

> The military genius of Hadrian is attested by the wonderful "Picts' Wall," of which the ruins still extend for miles between Tynemouth and the estuary of the Solway. The merit of the work has been claimed for Severus, for the generals who in the fifth century brought temporary help to Britain, and even for the native princes whom their masters had abandoned to the enemy. But after a long debate the opinion now prevails that the whole system of defence bears the features of a single mind, and that the wall and its parallel earthworks, its camps, roads, and stations, were designed and constructed by Hadrian alone.

Hagiographa (hā-ji-og'ra-fä). [Gr. ἁγιόγραφα, sacred writings: Heb. Kethubim, writings.] The Greek name of the last of the 3 Jewish divisions of the Old Testament. They are variously reckoned, but usually as 11: Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles.

> The third section of the Hebrew Bible consists of what are called the Hagiographa or "Kethubim," that is sacred writings. At the head of these stand three poetical books, — Psalms, Proverbs, and Job. Then come the five small books of Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther, which the Hebrews name the Megilloth, or "rolls." They have this name because they alone among the Hagiographa were used on certain annual occasions in the service of the synagogue, and for this purpose were written each in a separate volume.

Haiti, or Hayti (hā'ti; F. pron. ä-ē-tē'), Sp. Santo Domingo (san'to do-ming'go), and formerly Española (es-pan-yō'lä), Latinized as Hispaniola (his-pan-i-ō'lä). An island of the Greater Antilles, and next to Cuba the largest of the West Indian islands. It is separated from Cuba on the west by the Windward Passage, and from Porto Rico on the east by the Mona Passage, and is traversed from east to west by three mountain ranges. It contains mineral and especially vegetable wealth. It is divided politically into the republics of Haiti and Santo Domingo. It was discovered by Columbus in 1492, and in 1493 he established on it the first Spanish colony in the New World. Subsequently it was neglected, and became the prey of freebooters and buccaneers. About 1632 French adventurers settled in the western part, which was definitely ceded to France in 1697. Bloody revolutionary and slave revolts in the French colony (1790–93) ended in the supremacy of the blacks. Their leader, Toussaint l'Ouverture, governed the whole island from 1795, and proclaimed its independence in 1801. Temporarily reduced by Leclerc's expedition (1802–3), the blacks, aided by the English, recovered the western part, where Dessalines was emperor 1804–06. Struggles between the blacks and mulattoes and between rival leaders led to the division of this part of the island; but it was reunited under Boyer, who in 1822 conquered the Spanish or eastern end. In 1844 the Spanish part became independent, and since then the island has been divided politically into Haiti and the Dominican Republic, the former occupying about one third in the western part. (See these names.) Total area, about 29,850 square miles.

Haiti, or Hayti. A republic occupying the western portion of the island of Haiti. Capital, Port-au-Prince. The chief export is coffee. The executive is vested in a president, now elected for 7 years; and legislation is intrusted to an assembly comprising a senate and chamber of representatives. The prevailing language is a debased French, and the nominal religion is Roman Catholic. Independence was proclaimed 1804; Dessalines was emperor 1804–06; the eastern portion of the island was annexed in 1822, and finally separated in 1843; and Soulouque was emperor 1849–58 under the title of Faustin I. It has suffered continually from revolutions. Area, 10,204 square miles. Population (about nine tenths of which are blacks), 572,000.

Halley (hal'i), Edmund. Born at Haggerston, Shoreditch, London, Nov. 8, 1656; died at Greenwich, Jan. 14, 1742. A celebrated English astronomer. His father was engaged in the business of soap-boiling in London. He studied at St. Paul's School, and in 1673 at Queen's College, Oxford, but left the university in 1675 without taking a degree. His astronomical studies were begun at his boyhood. His first communication to the Royal Society was sent before he was 20, and in 1676 he sailed for St. Helena for the purpose of observing the positions of the stars in the southern hemisphere. The importance of observations made during this trip led Flamsteed to name him "the Southern Tycho." On Nov. 7, 1677, he made at St. Helena the first complete observation of a transit of Mercury." In 1678 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society. He was a friend of Sir Isaac Newton, and edited the "Principia" at his own cost. He was assistant secretary of the Royal Society and editor of the "Philosophical Transactions" 1685–93; was appointed Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford in 1703; became secretary of the Royal Society in 1713; and was appointed successor to Flamsteed as astronomer royal in 1721. From Nov., 1698, to Sept., 1700, he explored the South Atlantic in the Paramour Pink (retaining rather over to England) for the purpose of studying the variation of the compass and discovering southern lands, and reached lat. 52° S. In 1701 he made the same vessel be surveyed the tides and coasts of the English Channel. He is best known from his studies of comets. He inferred from his computations that the comets of 1531, 1607, and 1682 were in reality the same body, and predicted its return in 1758, a prediction which was verified on the appearance on Christmas day of that year. This comet has since been known by his name.

He became connected with the Shakspere Society in 1840. In March, 1872, he bought the theater at Stratford-on-Avon; he was also the means of buying Shakspere's house, New Place, at Stratford-on-Avon, and conveyed it to the corporation of Stratford. Among his works are "Early History of Freemasonry in England" (1843), "Nursery Rhymes of England, etc." (1845), "Dictionary of Archaic and Provincial Words" (1847), "Outlines of the Life of Shakspere" (1848). In 1853–65 he published a folio edition of Shakspere in 16 vols., and in 1862–71 "Lithographed Facsimiles of the Shakspearian Quartos." He edited many Middle English and early modern English works.

Hall of Fame, G. Ruhmeshalle (rö'mes-hälle). A building at Munich, Bavaria, completed 1853, consisting of a Greek Doric portico, with projecting wings, raised on a high basement of masonry. The portico contains 80 busts of celebrated Bavarians. The colossal statue of Bavaria, in bronze, by Schwanthaler, which stands beside the Ruhmeshalle, is 62 feet high: it represents a woman of robust form holding a wreath in her raised left hand, and with legend, a magician who in the year 1284, for a stipulated sum of money, freed the town of Hameln from a plague of rats by playing on his pipe and leading the vermin, which followed the music, into the river where they were drowned. When the townsmen refused to pay the money, the piper returned and, again playing on his magical pipe, led the way through the Bungen-Strasse out of the town, this time followed by 130 children. He led them to a hill called the Koppenberg, into which they all entered and disappeared. The event is recorded in inscriptions on the Rathaus and elsewhere in the town, and was long regarded as historical. The legend has been told in rime by Robert Browning. He apparently founded it on Verstegan's account in his "Restitution of Decayed Intelligence" (1634). Brandenburg, Lorch, and other towns have a similar tradition, and there are Chinese and Persian legends much resembling it.

Hamites (ham'its). [From Ham, the son of Noah.] A race generally counted with the white race, together with the Semitic neighbors and kinsmen, but in which, from the earliest times, 3 varieties (a pale and red-haired, a reddish, and a dark-brown) have been distinguished. The blond type is found among the Berbers; the reddish among the Egyptians and Bedja; the dark-brown or black among the Somal, the Galla, and the Fulbe or Fulahs. In these three the admixture of Negritic blood is evident. The earliest civilization of mankind (that of Egypt, to which all the others seem to be directly or indirectly indebted) flourished among the Hamites of the reddish type, in the Lower Nile valley. The Hamitic family of languages is generally divided into 3 subgroups: (a) the Libyan or Berber, spoken from the Canary Islands to Egypt; (b) the Egyptian, comprising Old Egyptian and Coptic with its 4 dialects; (c) the Ethiopic, including the Bedja, Bankali, Somali, Galla, Agau, Saho, and Bilin. The Ethiopic is also called Cushitic or Danic. Lately the Fulah cluster has been added by some to the preceding, as prevailingly Hamitic, owing to ethnic and linguistic mixtures with negroes; it is impossible to draw a clear line between Hamitic and Bantu-negro languages or tribes. Even the Hausa and Hottentot languages show traces of Hamitic structure. The Hamitic languages are sometimes called semic or sub-Semitic. In eastern North Africa they are intermixed geographically with the Semitic; in western North Africa, the Semitic are superposed on the Hamitic. See African languages (under Africa), Fulah, Hottentot, Berber, Bantu.

Hamitic (ha-mit'ik). See Hamites.

Hamlet (ham'let), or Amlet. A mythical or semi-historical Danish prince whose story, originating in a Danish saga, is given by Saxo-Grammaticus. This story is given in a French version by Belleforest in 1570 in the fifth volume of his "Histoires tragiques." The English translation of this latter was published as "Hystorie of Hamblet," and it was also made into an English play, now lost, that probably served as a starting-point for Shakspere's "Hamlet." Henslowe mentions a play of this name as represented at Newington Butts, June 9, 1594, which was an "old play." Shakspere's "Hamlet" was played in 1600 or 1601, and printed first in 1603. It was entered on the "Stationers' Register," July 26, 1602, "A booke called the Revenge of Hamlett Prince Denmarke as yt was lately Acted by the Lord Chamberleyne his Servantes." This was a very imperfect text, known as the first quarto. The second quarto was published in 1604, was a good text, thought to be as Shakspere left it. The third quarto, a reprint of the second, appeared in 1605; the fourth in 1611. There is a fifth quarto, undated. No others appeared during Shakspere's lifetime. The 4 folios are essentially the same text, which differs from the quartos. The German play "Der bestrafte Brudermord, oder Prinz Hamlet aus Dännemarck" ("Fratricide punished, or Prince Hamlet of Denmark") is now thought to be probably a weak copy of the old play preceding the 1603 quarto. It is not known precisely when it appeared, but it was early in the 17th century. (See Shakspere.) Also the character of Hamlet and his real or feigned insanity there has been much controverted. He shows the unfitness of a thoughtful man who sees both sides of a question to deal with questions requiring prompt action under extraordinary circumstances.

Hamlet, an opera by Ambroise Thomas, first produced at Paris in 1868. The French words are by Barbier and Carré, after Shakspere. It was produced in London in Italian as "Amleto" in 1869.

Hammurabi (ham-mō-rä'bē). The first king of all Babylonia, with residence in the city of Babylon. In his long reign (about 2287–2232 B. C.) he showed himself great alike in war and peace. He drove out the remnants of the Elamitic invaders, united North and South Babylonia (Shumir and Akkad) under his sway, and made Babylon the metropolis of the united kingdom, which it remained during the whole of its existence for nearly 2,000 years, so that he termed himself "king of Babylonian empire. After freeing and uniting the country, he turned his attention to its protection and interior prosperity. To obviate the disastrous inundations that at the same time to provide the country with water, he executed one of the greatest works, the excavation of a gigantic canal, named after him nahr-Hammurabi, later famous as "the royal canal of Babylon." Besides this, he constructed a great walk along the Tigris, and erected many temples. Numerous inscriptions of him have survived.

Hampton Court. A royal palace on the Thames 12 miles from Charing Cross, built by Cardinal Wolsey. A great part of the highly picturesque battlemented Tudor buildings in red brick, surrounding 3 courts, still remains. The property originally consisted of about 1,000 acres of more or less barren land belonging to the Knight Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem. It was leased from the Priory of St. John in 1515 by Thomas Wolsey, archbishop of York and primate of England, who erected the original Gothic palace. In 1526 he surrendered the estate to Henry VIII., who added the chapel and great hall 1531–35. In the reign of William III. the great façade, modern state apartments and a gallery for the cartoons of Raphael were added by Sir Christopher Wren. The front on the fine French gardens is later, in the Renaissance style. The great hall, 106 by 40 feet, and 60 feet high, possesses a handsome open-framed roof with elaborate pendants. The state apartments are filled with paintings, many of them noted works. The cartoons by Raphael were removed to the South Kensington Museum. A part of the palace is now occupied by persons of good family in reduced circumstances. Hampton Court is most intimately associated with James I. and William III., and was a place of imprisonment of Charles I.

Hampton Court Conference. A conference appointed by James I., at Hampton Court, in 1604, to settle the disputes between the Puritan party and the High-Church party in the Church of England. It was conducted on three days (Jan. 14, 16, and 18), and resulted in a few alterations of the liturgy, but entirely failed to secure the objects sought by the Puritans. A very important indirect result of it was the revision of the Bible called the King James or authorized version, which was suggested at that time.

Handel (han'del), George Frederick, G. Georg Friedrich Händel. Born at Halle, Prussia, Feb. 23, 1685; died at London, April 14, 1759. A celebrated German composer. He studied with Zachau, organist of the cathedral at Halle, for 3 years. He then went to Berlin, where his powers of improvisation caused him to be regarded as a prodigy; then to Halle, where his father died. It became necessary for him to support his mother, and he went to Hamburg, where he entered the orchestra of the Opera House as "Cembalo di ripieno." He soon became known, and was made conductor. In 1705 his first opera, "Almira," was produced there. In 1706 he went to Italy. The burning of Germany in 1706, he accepted the position of kapellmeister from the Elector of Hanover, on condition that he should be allowed to visit England, having already received pressing invitations to do so. He first went to London in 1710. His opera "Rinaldo" was produced there in 1711. He undertook the direction of the Italian opera in 1720. Buononcini and Ariosti, both of whom he had known at Halle, also went to London about this time and formed an opposition to him, which gave rise to much feeling and to Byrom's epigram ending

"Strange all this difference should be
'Twixt Tweedledum and Tweedledee."

From 1729–34 he was in partnership with Heidegger at the King's Theatre. In 1737 he became bankrupt. In 1740, when he was about 55, he began to compose the oratorios which made him famous. His health was attacked by cataract, and he underwent three times, but without success. He was nearly if not entirely blind for the rest of his life, but continued to preside at the organ during his own oratorios. His fame increased, and his popularity which had attracted him during his earlier years died away. He is best known by his oratorios "Esther" (1720), "Saul" (1740), "Israel in Egypt" (1739), "The Messiah" (1742), "Samson" (1743), "Judas Maccabæus" (1747), "Joshua" (1748), "Jephthah" (1752), etc. He wrote 23 oratorios, more than 40 operas, "Acis and Galatea" and "Alexander's Feast" (cantatas), besides a great deal of church music, chamber music, odes, songs, etc. See his "Life" by Mainwaring, Schoelcher, and Chrysander.

Hanno (han'ō). King of Gaza, one of the five confederate cities of the Philistines. He is often mentioned by the name of Hanuna in the Assyrian inscriptions, and was involved in the conflict between Assyria and Egypt, Gaza being the frontier fortress on the Egyptian highway barring the road to the south. He is first mentioned in the annals of Tiglath Pileser III. (745–727), against whom he rebelled, but at the approach of whose army about 733 he fled to Egypt. Afterward he allied himself with Shabaka, the Ethiopian king of Egypt (the biblical So, Assyrian Sabe), against Sargon II. (722–705).

Hanno (han'ō). Lived probably in the 5th century B. C. A Carthaginian navigator who led a colonizing expedition to the western coast of Africa. An account of his voyage is extant in a Greek translation ("Periplus").

"In the flourishing times of Carthage" (no nearer date is known), Hanno and Himilco, two brothers belonging to the dominant clan of Magos, were despatched by the Senate to find new trading stations, and to found new colonies of the half-bred "Liby-Phœnician" population, from whose presence the State was always anxious to be freed. Each admiral was in command of a powerful fleet. Himilco was directed to go south from the Pillars of Hercules, and to skirt the African coast; Himilco was in like manner directed to keep to the coast of Spain. The records of both voyages were long preserved upon tablets in the temple of Moloch, and Hanno's account is still extant in a Greek translation. Himilco's tablet is lost, though it seems to have been extant as late as the fourth century of the Christian era; but its form is known from the "Periplus of Hanno," and its substance, to some extent, preserved in the extracts of Avienus.
Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 20.

Hannover (hän-nō'ver), Eng. Hanover (han'ō-ver), F. Hanovre (á-nō'vr). A province of Prussia. Capital, Hannover. It was formerly a kingdom bounded by the North Sea, Oldenburg, Schleswig-Holstein, and Hamburg (separated from these two by the Elbe) on the north, Mecklenburg and Brandenburg (separated by the Elbe) on the east, Brunswick, Waldeck, Lippe, Schaumburg-Lippe, and Westphalia on the south, and the Netherlands and Oldenburg on the west. It is nearly cut in two by Oldenburg. South of it is a detached portion, separated by Brunswick, and reaching south to Hesse-Nassau, and there are several minor exclaves. The surface is low-level; the Harz, Weser hills, and Teutoburger Wald are in the south. The chief rivers are the Ems, Weser (with the Aller and Leine), and Elbe. The leading occupation is agriculture. In the south are mines of coal, iron, lead, copper, and salt. There are considerable manufactures. The province is divided into 6 districts—Hannover, Hildesheim, Osnabrück, Lüneburg, Aurich, and Stade. The greater part of the population is Protestant. Hannover formed part of the old duchy of Saxony. The Welf house, which had acquired Bavaria in 1156, obtained Hannover, etc., in 1692. After the deposition (1180) of Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony and Bavaria, his son William obtained (1202) Lüneburg, Lauenburg, etc., and was the ancestor of the Welf line. His son Otto was duke of Brunswick-Lüneburg, acquired Celle, Hannover, etc. There were various divisions and reunions, and 2 main lines, Lüneburg and Wolfenbüttel. In 1692 the principality of Hannover became the electorate of Hanover. The second elector, George Louis, succeeded to the British throne as George I. in 1714 (founder of the British line of Hanover, Brunswick, or the Guelfs: see Guelf, 1.). The duchies of Bremen and Verden were acquired in 1719. Hannover was occupied by the French in 1803; was ceded to Prussia in 1805; and was taken from Prussia in 1806. Part of it was allotted to the kingdom of Westphalia in 1807, and another portion in 1810. It was liberated in 1813. By the Congress of Vienna (1814–15) it was raised to a kingdom, and received accessions (East Friesland, Hildesheim, etc.). It entered the Germanic Confederation in 1815. A constitution was given to it in 1833, which was suspended in 1837. Hannover was separated from Great Britain in 1837, Ernest Augustus, duke of Cumberland, succeeding King William of England. An alliance between Prussia, Hannover, and Saxony was formed in 1841, and another in 1849–51 (both against Prussia) in 1866. It was annexed to Prussia in 1866. The Duke of Cumberland (representative of the house of the Guelfs) resigned his claim to Hannover in 1882, receiving in exchange from Prussia the "Guelf fund." (See Brunswick.) Area, 14,853 square miles. Population (1890), 2,278,361.

Hanseatic League (han-sē-at'ik lēg), or the German Hanse or Hansa. A medieval confederation of cities of northern Germany and adjacent countries, called the Hanse-towns, at one time numbering about 90, with affiliated cities in nearly all parts of Europe, for the promotion of commerce by sea and land, and for its protection against pirates, robbers, and hostile governments. At the height of its prosperity it exercised sovereign powers, made treaties, and often enforced its claims by leagues in Scandinavia, England, Portugal, and elsewhere. Its origin is commonly dated from a compact between Hamburg and Lübeck in 1241, although commercial unions of German towns had existed previously. The league held triennial general assemblies (usually at Lübeck, its chief seat); and, after a long period of decline and attempts at reconstitution, the last general assembly, representing 6 cities, was held in 1669. The name was retained, however, by the union of the free cities of Lübeck, Hamburg, and Bremen, which are now members of the German Empire.

He was servant, messenger, spy, intriguant, and conjuror, and was dressed in motley and provided with a cracking whip, like the old gleeman. He was obscene and vulgar, a great eater and drinker, a braggart and a coward. He was the hero of farce and the jester of tragedy, and he even forced his way into Hamburg Opera. . . . He went under different names at different periods, Pickelhering, Harlequin, and Hanswurst being the most frequent. . . . Away as 1708 a German theatre was established in the imperial capital, and its founder, Joseph Stranitzky, a Silesian, made extensive use of the characters and plots of Italian farce: he himself acted Harlequin, to whom he gave the old German name of Hanswurst, a title borne even locally by the clown of the earlier drama. He made him appear more efficiently the Viennese. His Hanswurst came from Salzburg, just as the Italian Arlecchino came from Bergamo, and both were made to speak in their native dialect. As Arlecchino has his own special costume, made of triangular patches of cloth, so Hanswurst always appeared as a peasant with the characteristic green pointed hat. Scherer Hist. German Lit. (trans.), I. 398.

Hanuman (ha'nō-män). [Skt., lit. 'having (large) jaws.'] In Hindu mythology, a monkey chief who is a conspicuous figure in the Ramayana. He and the other monkeys who assisted Rama in his war against Ravana were of divine origin and superhuman powers. Hanuman jumped from India to Ceylon in one bound, tore up trees, carried away the Himalayas, and performed other wonderful exploits. Accompanying Rama on his return to Ayodhya, he received from him the reward of perpetual life and youth. His exploits are favorite topics among Hindus from childhood to old age, paintings of them are common, and there are temples for his worship.

Hapi (hä'pē). In Egyptian mythology, the Nile as a deity; the god Nilus.

We can more easily understand the worship of the god Hapi, the Nile. We can readily realise that the Egyptians had to thank the inundations of the river for almost all blessings. It is true no special temples seem to have been erected to this god, but we find that gifts were presented to him everywhere, and he was worshipped as a god in hymns and was identified with other gods.

Hapsburg (haps'bėrg; G. pron. haps'bōrc), or Habsburg (haps'bōrc). House of. [G. Hapsburg, Habsburg, orig. Habichtsburg, hawk's castle.] A German princely family which derived its name from the castle of Hapsburg (which see), and which has furnished sovereigns to the Holy Roman Empire, Austria, and Spain. The title Count of Hapsburg was assumed by Werner I., who died in 1096. Count Rudolf was elected emperor as Rudolf I. in 1273, acquired Austria, and founded the imperial line which reigned 1273-1437. Count Rudolf IV. was created archduke of Austria in 1453. In 1477 the emperor Maximilian I. acquired the extensive domain (except the duchy itself) of the third house of Burgundy by marriage with the heiress Mary, and in 1490 had all the Hapsburg possessions united in his hands by the abdication of Count Sigismund. The last male heir of the Hapsburg-Austrian house, queen of Aragon and Castile. Their eldest son became king of Spain as Charles I., in 1516, and emperor as Charles V. in 1519. Their second son Ferdinand received the archduchy of Austria, to which he added by marriage the kingdoms of Bohemia and Hungary. The Spanish line was continued by Charles's son Philip II., and reigned 1556-1700. On the abdication of the imperial crown by Charles V., in 1556, he was succeeded by his brother Ferdinand, who continued the imperial line, the last male representative of which was Charles VI., who died in 1740. In 1740 his daughter Maria Theresa succeeded to the Austrian inheritance by virtue of the pragmatic sanction (which see). She married Francis I., grand duke of Tuscany, of the house of Lorraine, who became emperor in 1745, and founded the Hapsburg-Lorraine line, members of which ruled as emperors of the Holy Roman Empire until its abolition in 1806, and have since ruled as emperors of Austria.

Hapsburg Castle. See the extract.

Hapsburg is a castle (built about A. D. 1020) in the Aargau on the banks of the Aar, and near the line of railway from Olten to Zürich, from a point on which a glimpse of it may be had. "Within the ancient walls of Vindonissa," says Gibbon, "the castle of Hapsburg, the abbey of Königsfelden, and the town of Brugg have successively arisen. The philosophic traveller may compare the monuments of Roman conquests, of feudal or Austrian tyranny, of monkish superstition, and of industrious freedom. If he be tempted to prefer the present to the past, he may acquiesce in his own time." Bryce, Holy Roman Empire, p. 243.

Haran (hā'ran). [Heb. Haran. Assyro-Babylonian Harranu, Gr. Χαῤῥάν, L. Carræ or Charra.] A city in Mesopotamia, situated on the Belias (Belich, ancient Bilichus), a small affluent of the Euphrates, 10 hours southeast from Edessa. The Assyrian meaning of the name is 'road,' probably so called as the crossing-point of the Syrian, Assyrian, and Babylonian trade routes. In the Old Testament it is mentioned in connection with the patriarchs, and Ezekiel (xxvii. 23) speaks of it as a considerable trading center. It is often mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions. It was an ancient seat of the worship of the moon-god Sin; and Nabunaid, the last Babylonian king (555–538 B. C.), relates that Sin, in a dream, commanded him to restore his temple E-hul-hul ('house of joy') in Haran, which was destroyed by the Scythians during their invasion under Asurbanipal. Nabunaid thereupon restored or rather completed the restoration of the temple, and adorned the city. Haran became famous among the Romans, being near the scene of the defeat of Crassus by the Parthians. About the time of the Christian era it appears to have formed part of the kingdom of Edessa. Afterward it came with that kingdom under the dominion of the Romans. In the 4th century it was the seat of a bishop. At present it is a small village inhabited by a few Arab families.

Harmodius (här-mō'di-us) and Aristogiton (ar-is-to-ji'ton). Killed 514 B.C. Two Athenian youths who killed Hipparchus, tyrant of Athens, in 514. They are represented as entertaining a strong affection for each other, which remained unaltered despite the attempt of Hipparchus to withdraw the affection of the young and beautiful Harmodius to himself. Enraged at the indifference of Harmodius, Hipparchus put a public insult upon his sister by refusing her admission to carry the sacred baskets at a religious procession, in revenge for which the youths organized a conspiracy to overthrow both Hipparchus and his brother Hippias. Harmodius and Aristogiton slew the former on the festival of the great Panathenæa, but then precipitancy prevented the conspirators from effecting a general rising of the young and beautiful Harmodius to himself. Enraged at the indifference of Harmodius, Hipparchus put a public insult upon his sister by refusing her admission to carry the sacred baskets at a religious procession, in revenge for which the youths organized a conspiracy to overthrow both Hippias and his brother Hipparchus other hand the "ankh," or emblem of life, hovers over the face of the corpse. Now this Soul, this "Ba," is a loving visitant to the dead man. It brings a breath of the sweet north wind, and the cheering hope of immortality in the sunny Fields of Aalulu. The Greeks, however, misapprehending its nature and functions, conceived of it as a malevolent emissary of the gods, and converted it into the Harpy. We have next the Greek conception of a Harpy, from a fragment of early Greek painted ware found at Daphne. But we have a still finer example in the illustrations reproduced from the famous Harpy Tomb in the British Museum. The Harpy is carrying off one of the daughters of Pandarus. She wears a fillet and pendant curls, and, besides the wings of a bird, she has human arms like the Egyptian "Ba," who wrath to clasp her prey. The monument from which this group is copied was discovered by Sir Charles Fellows at Xanthus in Lycia, and it dates from about two hundred and forty years before our era. Edwards, Pharaohs, Fellahs etc., p. 187.

Harpocrates (hăr-pok'ra-tēz). A deity of Egyptian origin, identified with Horus, adopted by the Greeks and Romans.

Harpocration (hăr-pō-kra'shi-on). Valerius. Lived 2d (4th?) century. A Greek rhetorician of Alexandria, author of a lexicon of the works of the Attic orators (edited by Bindorf 1853).

All that we know of Valerius Harpocration is contained in the brief statement by Suidas that he was a rhetorician of Alexandria; and that besides the "Lexicon to the Ten Orators," which has come down to us, he wrote a book of elegant extracts, which is lost. Even the age at which he flourished is quite uncertain; for while some identify him with the Harpocration who taught Greek to the emperor L. Verus, others recognize in him either the contemporary and friend of Libanius, or the physician of Mendes, mentioned by Athenæus.

Harvard University. The oldest and largest institution of learning in America, situated partly in Cambridge and partly in Boston, Massachusetts. The college was founded by the general court of the colony of Massachusetts Bay in 1636. Two years later the name Harvard was given to it in memory of John Harvard (see above). The university includes Harvard College, the Lawrence Scientific School, the Graduate School, the Divinity School, the Law School, the Medical School, the Dental School, the School of Veterinary Medicine, the Bussey Institution, a school of agriculture, and the Arnold Arboretum, the first five of which are situated in Cambridge, the last five in Boston; also the University Library, the Museum of Comparative Zoology (popularly known as the Agassiz Museum), the University Museum, the Botanic Gardens, the Herbarium, the Astronomical Observatory, and the Peabody Museum of American Archæology and Ethnology, all of which are in Cambridge. It is governed by two boards — the corporation, consisting of the president, treasurer, and 5 fellows, in whom is vested the title to the property of the university, and the board of overseers, 30 in number (besides the president and treasurer), until 1886, when the State government maintained a motor or less direct control over the overseers, but since then they have been elected by graduates of the university. The number of teachers at present (1890) is 362, of students in all departments, 3,456 (1,656 of them in the college proper). There were 1,000 students in the summer schools in 1890. The endowment of the university is over $8,000,000; its other property, including lands and buildings, is $4,000,000 more. Its annual income is about $1,000,000. Its fellowships and scholarships yield $80,000 a year. The library contains about 450,000 bound volumes, and nearly as many pamphlets and maps.

Harvey (härʹvi), Gabriel. Born at Saffron Walden, Essex, 1545 (?); died there, 1630. An English author. He matriculated at Christ's College, Cambridge, in 1566, and in 1570 was elected a fellow of Pembroke. While there he became intimate with Edmund Spenser, to whom he addressed "Three Proper and Wittie Familiar Letters." He exercised for some years an influence over Spenser's poems, from which the latter, when advised by Harvey, would withdraw passages that were too arrogant, bitter, spirit, and was continuously at war with those who surrounded him. This finally culminated in a pamphlet paper warfare with Nash and Greene, which began with Greene's "Quip for an Upstart Courtier," addressed in retaliation for contemptuous references to himself in the writings of Harvey's brother Richard, to which Harvey replied in "A New Letter of Notable Contents" (1593), and Greene unmercifully. Even the death of Greene, which occurred soon after, did not prevent Harvey's attempts to blacken his name, which now began, with great powers of invective and sarcasm, to defend his friend's memory. In his "Strange News" (1593) he proclaimed "open wars against Envy, and his brethren." Harvey replied with "Pierce's Supererogation." The warfare continued till in 1596 Nashe, hearing that Harvey boasted of having silenced him, "published his famous satire, 'Have with you to Saffron Walden,' which he dedicated, in spite of Lane to Richard Lichfield, barber of Trinity College, Cambridge, and to this Harvey once more rejoined in his 'Pierce's Supererogation.' Nashe's 'Lenten Stuffe' (1599) and Harvey's 'Trimming of Thomas Nashe' (1597) closed the controversy, which, however, now reached a climax, and in 1599 it was ordered by authority that all Nashes books and Dr Harveys books should be wholly suppressed. They may, and the whole of the same books shall be committed hereafter" (Stopes, Athenæ Cant., ii. 300) (Dict. Nat. Biog.). Among his works, besides those mentioned, are "Rhetor, sive de Peroratione Oratoris Novus" (1577), "Ciceronianus sive Oratio post Readitum Isabita Cantabrigiensi suos studiosos, etc. (1575), "The Story of Three Journeys" (1580), "Letter of Advice" (1580), and "Letter to Spenser" (1579-80). A Letter of Notable Contents (1593).

A range of mountains in Germany, situated in Brunswick, Anhalt, and the provinces of Hannover and Saxony in Prussia: the ancient Silva Hercynia. It is divided into the Upper Harz in the northwest and the Lower Harz in the other outlier, and is noted for mineral wealth and picturesque scenery. Among the chief minerals are lead, silver, iron, and copper. The highest summit is the Brocken (3,415 feet). Length of the chain, 56 miles.

Harzburg (härtsʹbŭrg). A small town in Brunswick, in the Harz 26 miles south of Brunswick. It consists of the villages Neustadt, Bundheim, and Schlewecke, and is a noted summer resort. Near it is the Burgberg, with the ruins of the castle of Harzburg.

Hasan, or Hassan, and Husein (Arabic pron. hāʹsen, hō-sānʹ). Sons of Ali and Fatima, daughter of Mohammed. Ali was Mohammed's cousin, and the first person, after his wife, who believed in him and was faithful to Mohammed. His brother, Jaʹafar, and vizier. He married Fatima, the prophet's daughter, and his sons Hasan and Husein were favorites with Mohammed, who had no sons, and was expected to name Ali as his successor. At Mohammed's death in 632 Ali was passed over, and Abu Beki, Omar, and Othman became successively caliphs. On Othman's assassination (655) Ali accepted the caliphate but was resisted by Moawiyah, who had set himself up as caliph, and with whom he fought a bloody but indecisive battle in Mesopotamia. Shortly after Ali was fatally stabbed by an enthusiast in the mosque of Kufa. The Mohammedan world is divided into about two great sects of Shiahs and Sunis. The Shiahs reject the first three caliphs as usurpers, and begin with Ali as the first lawful successor of Mohammed. The Sunis recognize Abu Beki, Omar, and Othman as well as Ali, and regard the Shiahs as impious heretics. Husein, one of Ali's sons, married Hasan's daughter Fatima. He led an expedition from Persia, where Persia became specially connected with the house of Ali. Moawiyah died in 680. His son Yezid succeeded him as caliph at Damascus. During Yezid's reign, Ali's sons, the imams Hasan and Husein, lived in retirement at Medina; but when Moawiyah died the people of Kufa sent offers to Husein to join them in that city. He set out for Kufa with his family and relatives to the number of 80. Then ensued the tragedy of Kerbela, familiar to every Mohammedan. Husein, in a battle on the plain of Kerbela, Hasan and his men were killed, and the women and children were afterward taken in chains to Damascus. The sufferings of the "Family of the Tent," as the imam Husein and his companions were called, excited the fanatical death of Hasan, who was poisoned by his wife, form the subject of a Persian tazaiesse (Tazyeh), or religious drama, resembling the Oberammergau Passion Play. This drama, which has sprung up within the present century, plays a great part in the religious life of the Persian of today. See "A Persian Passion Play" in Matthew Arnold's "Essays in Criticism."

Hasdrubal (has'drō-bal), or Asdrubal (as'drū-bal). A Carthaginian general, officer of high rank in the army of Hannibal in Italy. He was defeated greatly to the victory of Cannæ in 216 B. C. by a cavalry charge on the rear of the Roman infantry after having put the Roman horse to flight.

Hasdrubal, or Asdrubal. Died in Spain, 221 B. C. A Carthaginian general and politician. He rose to prominence as a leader of the democratic party at Carthage in the interval between the first and second Punic wars, and succeeded Hamilcar Barca in Spain, to whom he accompanied to Spain in 238. He subsequently returned to Africa to assume command in a war against the Numidians, and in 229 was again in Spain. In 228 he succeeded his father-in-law as commander in Spain, where he founded the city of New Carthage and largely extended the Carthaginian power. He was assassinated by a slave who as master he had put to death.

Hasdrubal, or Asdrubal. Died 207 B. C. A Carthaginian general, son of Hamilcar Barca and brother of Hannibal. He was left in charge of the Carthaginian forces in Spain when Hannibal set out on his expedition to Italy in 218. He maintained the war against the Romans under the brothers Cneius and Publius Scipio with varied success until 212, when, having been reinforced by a large army commanded by Magonal Hannibal, son of Gisco, he was enabled to inflict a decisive defeat upon Cneius, who fell in the battle. Publius having been killed a short time previously in a cavalry engagement. He was defeated by Scipio Africanus at Ilcarlis in 209, and probably in the same year crossed the Pyrenees on his way to join his brother in Italy. He crossed the Alps in 207, but was attacked and defeated by the Romans under C. Nero and M. Livius on the Metaurus in the same year before he could effect a junction with Hannibal. He fell in the engagement, and, according to Livy, his severed head was thrown into the camp of Hannibal by the victorious Romans.

Hasdrubal, or Asdrubal. Died about 200 B. C. A Carthaginian general, son of Gisco. He was sent to Spain with an army in 214, and on the departure about 200 of Hasdrubal, son of Hamilcar, on his expedition to join Hannibal in Italy was left with Magon in command of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. He was defeated with his colleague at Silpia or Elinga by Scipio Africanus in 208. Was in command of an army opposed to Scipio in Africa in 204, when his camp was burned by the Romans and nearly the whole of his army destroyed; and is said by some authorities to have taken poison to escape the fury of the Carthaginian populace.

Hasdrubal, or Asdrubal. A Carthaginian general. He was commander-in-chief in the war against Masinissa in 150 B. C. Having sustained a decisive defeat, he was punished with exile. He was, however, recalled on the outbreak of the third Punic war in 149, and was placed in command of the forces outside the walls of Carthage. He defeated the consul Manilius in two engagements at Nephæris about 148. He subsequently became commander of the forces within the city, which he defended with great obstinacy against Scipio in 146. He finally surrendered, and, after gracing the triumph of Scipio, was allowed to spend the rest of his life in honorable captivity. It is said that at the time of his surrender his wife upbraided him with cowardice, and threw herself and her children into the flames of the temple in which she had taken refuge.

Hasis-Adra (hä'sis-ä'drä). One of the persons in the Izdubar legends, or the Babylonian Nimrod epic, the ancestor of Izdubar or Gilgamesh. He is one of the heroes of that poem, and attained immortality and a life with the gods. When Izdubar comes to him and asks him how he obtained this distinction, he relates to him the story of the deluge, which forms a counterpart to the account of Berosus and of Genesis. He was living, he relates, in Surripak, an ancient city on the Euphrates (Sippar or Aphrarim), and was told by the god of the ocean, apprised him of the decision of the gods to cause a flood, and advised him to build a ship and to save himself, his family, friends, and goods. This he did. When the waters of the flood decreased, he left the ship, which rested on a mountain, and offered a sacrifice to the gods. After this he disappeared, and a voice from heaven informed his companions that he had been translated to the gods to live forever as a reward for his piety. He is therefore rightly termed the "Babylonian Noah." In Berosus he is called Xisuthrus, and is represented as the last of the first 10 mythical kings of Babylonia. His name in the inscriptions is also sometimes read Shamash-or Gil-or Pir-Napishtim (Sanu or fruit or product of life").

Hausa, or Haussa (hou'sä). A country and nation situated north of the junction of the Niger with the Binue River, in central Sudan. Hausa-land is almost coextensive with the modern kingdom of Sokoto. The Hausas form the most important nation of the Sudan. They belong to the Negritic branch of the Bantu-negro race slightly mixed with Hamitic elements. Their own tradition, their own religion, their features, their color, their language, all declare them to be a negro and not a Berber. The Gober section is of Copitic descent. The Hausas are Mohammedans, and Koran and secret traders, not agriculturists. In the slaving times Hausa slaves were in great demand; to-day, Hausa soldiers constitute a large portion of the British and Kowara armies. In the middle ages the Hausas formed a great negro kingdom, which subsequently broke up into small states. About the 16th century the Fulahs or Fullo began to get a foothold among them and in 1802 Othman dan Fodio founded in Hausa-land the great Fulah empire. From this, divided among his sons, sprang the modern sultanates of Sokoto, Gando, and Adamawa. The leading negro dialect is Hausa, which is a highly euphonious, simple and regular in structure, and eminently fit to become a literary language. The principal dialects are those of Katsena (the literary standard), Kano, Gober, and Daura.

Hauser (hou'zer), Kaspar. Died at Ansbach, Bavaria, Dec. 17, 1833. A German foundling. He appeared at Nuremberg in 1828, and was taken into the house of Professor Daumer, to whose guardianship he was assigned. He carried on his person a letter, purporting to have been written by a Bavarian laborer, which stated that the bearer was found in the water-shed of May 7, 1812. A note was inclosed, which purported to have been written by the mother. It stated that the foundling's name was Kaspar Hauser, that he was born April 30, 1812, that his father was a captain in the Sixth Chevau-leger Regiment at Nuremberg, and that his mother was a poor girl. It was said that he had been confined in a dark room all his life, until one night a man placed a letter in his hand and directed him on the road to Nuremberg. He was placed by the city under the care of Professor G. F. Daumer, and was subsequently adopted by Count Stanhope, who sent him to Ansbach. He died in consequence of a wound which he asserted he had received at the hands of an unknown person who had enticed him to a rendezvous by the promise of information as to his origin. His story underwent many romantic changes in popular imagination.

Havelock the Dane, The Lay of. An Anglo-Danish story, composed before 1300. It contains the legend of the town of Grimsby. There is a French lay called "le lai d'Havelok le Danois." It is a translation of a French romance called "le lai de Aveles," written in the first half of the 12th century, and probably founded on an Anglo-Saxon original. It has been edited by Sir F. Madden for the Roxburghe club (1828), and reedited for the Early English Text Society, by W. W. Skeat (1868). Havelok was the son of the Danish king Birkenbeen. He was put to sea by treachery, and was saved by Grim, a fisherman, who brought him up as his son. Grim was rewarded by the king when the truth was discovered, and with the money given him built Grimsby, or Grim's town.

Havilah (hav'i-lä). In the description of Eden in Gen. ii., a land mentioned as encompassed by the Pishon, one of the four rivers which go out from Eden, and as containing gold and bedellium and shoham stone. As Pishon has been identified with almost all rivers, so Havilah was sought and found in all parts of the earth, notably in Armenia (Colchis) and India. Frederick Delitzsch, who locates Eden in Babylonia, near Babylon (see Eden), identifies Havilah with the tract immediately to the south and west of the Euphrates. Havilah is also enumerated in Gen. x. 7 among the descendants of Cush, son of Ham; and in Gen. x. 29 among the sons of Joktan, a descendant of Shem; and in Gen. xxv. 18 it appears as the southeastern limit of the Ishmaelite Arabs. It perhaps designates the east or southeast of Arabia on the Persian Gulf, in which region, according to Strabo, a tribe by the name of Chaulotaeans lived, who were neighbors of the Nabataeans and Hazarenes. On the other hand, the Analists of the classical writers (Pliny, VI. 28), a people with a town Anaila (now Zeila) on the African coast, south of the strait of Bab-el-Mandeb, would answer to the Cushite Havilah.

Haviland (hav'i-land), John. Born at Gundenham, Somersetshire, in 1793; died at Philadelphia, March 28, 1852. An English architect. He studied with James Elmes. Capital, Honolulu. The chief islands are Hawaii, Maui, Oahu, Kauai, Lanai, Kahului, Molokai, Niihau. The surface is largely mountainous and volcanic. The chief exports are sugar, rice, bananas, coffee, hides, and wool. The inhabitants are native Hawaiians (35,000, decreasing), Chinese (15,301), Japanese (12,360), Portuguese (8,602), Americans (2,119), British (1,928), Germans (1,034), etc. The islands were discovered by Cook in 1442, and rediscovered in 1778 by Cook (who gave them the name Owhyhee). The government was established by kamehameha I. (who died in 1819), and finally was abolished in 1819. The next year the American missionaries arrived. A constitution was granted in 1840, and a municipal council in 1845. The government was a monarchy, with king, cabinet, and legislature (consisting of a house of nobles and house of representatives). The queen, Liliuokalani (who succeeded her brother, on his death, Jan. 15, 1891, attempted to force the cabinet to approve a new constitution designed to give greater power to the crown and to the native population. The cabinet declined to do so, and the queen was deposed by a committee of public safety, and a provisional government was formed, headed by Mr. Sanford B. Dole, which was to retain office until a treaty of annexation with the United States should be concluded. Such a treaty was sent to the Senate by President Harrison, but it was withdrawn by President Cleveland on the ground that the revolution in Hawaii was wrongfully accomplished by the aid of the American minister, Mr. Stevens, and the American naval force, and that the queen should be reinstated on her throne. His effort to establish this end by diplomatic means failed.

Haymarket Theatre, A London theater standing in the Haymarket opposite Charles street. Next to Drury Lane no theater in London is so rich in theatrical tradition as the little Theatre in the Haymarket. During the patent monopoly it was a kind of chapel of ease or transcendent to Drury Lane and Covent Garden. In 1720 one John Potter purchased the site of an old inn, the King's Head, in the Haymarket, and erected there a small theater. The house was leased to a company of French actors, and opened with "La fille à la mode, ou le Badinage de Paris," under the patronage of the Duke of Richmond. Some years after it was called "the New French Theatre." Fielding's is the first great name connected with this theater. In 1736 he produced "The Tragedy of Tragedies, or Tom Thumb the Great," and became manager in 1737. In Feb., 1741, Charles Macklin opened the Haymarket with a company largely composed of his own pupils. On April 22, 1747, Samuel Foote assumed the management. In 1766 he obtained a patent for the theater during his lifetime. In 1776 Foote sold the theater to Colman the elder, who managed it till 1794. When Harris became manager in 1821, he demolished the 44 boxes (its site is now occupied by the Cafe de l'Europe) and erected a new one a little farther north. It was opened July 4, 1821, with "The Rivals." The present theater was built in 1880.

Heavenfield, Battle of (634? 635?). A battle fought near the wall of Antoninus in the north of England, where Oswald of Northumbria defeated the Britons under Cadwallon (Cadwallan), who fell in the engagement. According to legend, Oswald entertained a vision of St. Columba, the founder of Iona, in a dream the night before the battle. The apparition shrouded the British king with its mantle, and said to Oswald, "Be strong, and do like a man; lo! I am with thee." On the morrow Oswald communicated his dream to the army, which was then encamped "on a hill, pledged itself to become Christian if it conquered in the fight: for in the whole Northumbrian host only Oswald and his 32 chiefs were Christians." So Oswald, assisted by his soldiers, set up a cross of wood as a standard, and the field of battle was in after times called Heaven's field, in allusion to the miraculous intervention of heaven of which it was the scene.

Hébert (ā-bār'), Antoine Auguste Ernest. Born at Grenoble, France, Nov. 3, 1817. A French painter.

Hébert, Jacques René, surnamed Le Père Duchesne. Born at Alençon, France, 1755; died at Paris, March 24, 1794. A notorious French revolutionist. He was of obscure parentage and limited education, and at the beginning of the First Revolution was living in poverty at Paris, having lost at least two situations through malconduct. On the outbreak of the Revolution he acquired influence in the clubs as a scurrilous and violent but really speaker and writer, and was chosen to edit a new Revolutionary paper called "Le Père Duchesne" from a popular conservational paper of the same name. He became widely known in the provinces and in the army under the name of his paper; was a leader of the most violent faction in the Revolutionary Commune after Aug. 10, 1792; and was appointed substitute to the procureur syndic Sept. 2 following. On May 24, 1793, he was arrested by order of the more moderate party in the Commune, but was released in consequence of a demonstration in his favor by the mob. He instituted, in conjunction with Chaumette and Anacharsis Cloots, the worship of the goddess Reason, and organized the ultra-revolutionary party known as the Hébertistes or enragés. He was the principal witness before the Revolutionary tribunal against Marie Antoinette, whom he accused of incest with her son. He caused the downfall of Father d'Eglantine, Danton, and Camille Desmoulins, and was sent to the guillotine by Robespierre, and died amid the jeers of the multitude who passed on foot to the place of execution.

Hebrew (hē'brō). The language spoken by the Hebrews, one of the northern or Canaanitic divisions of the Semitic family of languages. It is the language of the books of the Old Testament, with the exception of portions of Daniel and Ezra, and the ancient Canaanitic or Phœnician tongue, of course, before the Christian era. It is still the language of the synagogue, and is employed as a scholars' language; has an advanced modern biblical and even modern lithuritic, and is become the vernacular of the Jews of Palestine.

Hebrew Melodies. A collection of poems by Lord Byron, published in 1815.

Hebrews (hē'brōz). [Arab. 'ebriyā, Heb. 'ibrī, 'ibhrīm, a Hebrew, referred to an eponymous Eber or Heber; orig. 'those of the other side' (of the Euphrates).] The members of that branch of the Semitic family of mankind descended, according to tradition, from Heber, the great-grandson of Shem, in the line of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; the Israelites; the Jews.

These tribes, first of all trans-Euphratian which had become, by crossing the stream, cis-Euphratian, took the generic name of Hebrews (Deut. 'those of the other side'), though we do not know whether they took it when they left the Euphrates between themselves and the nation by whom remained the Euphratian Chaldees, or whether it was the Canaanites who called them 'those from beyond,' or, to be more accurate, "the one who had crossed the river."

Rome, Hist. of the People of Israel, I. 76.

Hebrews, Epistle to the. One of the books of the New Testament, addressed to Christians of Hebrew birth dwelling in Rome, or perhaps in Palestine or Alexandria. It appears to be a present a parallel between the symbolism of the Old Testament dispensation and the life work of Christ. The author is unknown — perhaps Barnabas, or less probably Apollos. The authorship has often been ascribed to Saint Paul, but this view is contrary to the weight of authority of the early church, and is opposed by most modern scholars. A probable date of composition is about A. D. 66.

Hebrides (heb'ri-dēz), or Western Isles. [NL. Hebrides, an error for L. Hebudes (Pliny), var. of Hebudæ, Gr. Ἑβοῦδαι (Ptolemy), pl. of Ἑβοῦδα, applied to the principal island.] A group of islands west of Scotland, the ancient Ebudæ (Ptolemy) or Hebudes (Pliny). It comprises the outer Hebrides or Long Island, the chief of which is the largest island, North Uist, South Uist, Barra, and smaller islands) and the Inner Hebrides (Skye, Mull, Iona, Eigg, Coll, Tiree, Colonsay, Jura, Islay, and smaller islands). Tattooed Arans are also sometimes included. Many in the Hebrides are noted for picturesque scenery. Politically they form part of Scotland, Lewis or the Lewes being in Ross-shire, and the rest of the group in Argyll-shire, chiefly in Argyll. The early celtic inhabitants were christianized by Columba. The islands were colonized from Norway in the fifteenth century, were ceded by Norway to Scotland, and were ruled by the "Lords of the Isles" in the 14th, 15th and 16th centuries. The inhabited islands number about 120. Area, about 3,000 square miles. Population, about 100,000.

Hebrides, New. See New Hebrides.

Hebron (hē'brọn). [Heb., 'association' or 'friendship.'] A city in Palestine, situated on a hill among the mountains of Judah, about 7 hours south of Jerusalem. It is one of the oldest existing biblical towns. According to Num. xiii. 22, it was built 7 years before Zoan (i. e. Tanis, the capital of Lower Egypt), and Josephus says that in his day it was 2,300 years old. Its former name was Kiriath Arba (Josh. xiv. 15). It was the home and burial-place of Abraham, and after ward it became an important city in the territory of Judah. David resided here the first 7 years of his reign. Later it was taken possession of by Ishmaelites from Arabia. Modern travelers recapture it at the Mosque of Abraham (or of the Cave of Machpelah, a magnificent mosque is erected, accessible only to Mohammedans by special firman of the sultan was required for the admittance of the Prince of Wales in 1862, the Marquis of Bute in 1866, and the Crown Prince of Prussia in 1869). Dean Stanley and Major Conder have examined the mosque, and described the supposed cave.

Hebrus (hē'brus). [Gr. Ἕβρος.] The ancient name of the river Maritza.

Hecataeus (hek-a-tē'us) of Abdera. A Greek philosopher and historian who lived about 320 B. C. He was a pupil of the Skeptic Pyrrho, and appears to have accompanied Alexander the Great on his Asiatic expedition. He wrote a work on the Hyperboreans, and another on Egypt. Some critics also attribute to him a work on the Jews. An edition of the extant fragments of his works has been published by F. Zorn ("Hecatei Abderitæ Fragmenta," 1720).

Hecataeus of Miletus. Died about 476 B. C. A Greek geographer and historian. He was the son of Hegesander, and was descended from an ancient and illustrious family at Miletus. He traveled in Egypt and elsewhere to obtain materials for his works. He tried to dissuade the Ionians from the revolt against the Persians in 500 B.C.; subsequently saved as ambassador to Artaphernes whom he prevailed upon to treat the conquered insurgents with mildness. He wrote "Periegesis" (περιήγησις, etc., the extant fragments of which have been edited by R. H. Klausen ("Hecatei Milesii Fragmenta," 1831).

Hecate (hek'ā-te). [Gr. Ἑκάτη.] In Greek mythology, a goddess akin to Artemis, of Thracian origin. She combined the attributes of Demeter or Cybele, Hera, Hebe, Artemis, or Diana, and Persephone or Proserpine, with whom, as a goddess of the infernal regions, she was to some extent identified, and in this character was represented as presiding and teaching through her enticements sorcery and witchcraft. She played an important part in later demonology.

Hechingen (hech'ing-en). A small town in the province of Hohenzollern, Prussia, situated 31 miles southeast of Stuttgart. Population (1890), 5,743.

Hecker (hek'er), Isaac Thomas. Born at New York, Dec. 18, 1819; died there, Dec. 22, 1888. An American Roman Catholic ecclesiastic. He was at one time a member of the Brook Farm Community. He became a priest in 1849, founded in 1858 the order of the Paulists, of which he was appointed superior, and established the "Catholic World" in 1865.

Heckewelder (hek'e-wel-der), John Gottlieb Ernest. Born at Bedford, England, March 12, 1743; died at Bethlehem, Pa., Jan. 21, 1823. A Moravian missionary among the Indians.

Heckmondwike (hek'mond-wik). A town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, England, 8 miles southwest of Leeds. Population (1891), 9,709.

Hecla, or Hekla (hek'lä). [Icel. Hekla, short for old Icel. Hafdi-klæ, Hafdi a hill of the hood (see, of snow): hekla, gen. of hekla, a cowled or hooded frock.] A volcano in the southwestern part of Iceland, 70 miles east of Reykjavik. It is noted for the frequency and violence of its eruptions. Height, 5,108 feet.

Hector (hek'tor), [Gr. Ἕκτωρ.] In Greek legend, the son of Priam and Hecuba; champion of the Trojans, and the principal character of the Iliad next to the hero Achilles. He slays Patroclus, who, in his chariot, dragged Hector's body thrice round the walls of Troy. He is introduced by Shakspere in his "Troilus and Cressida."

Critics, old and new, have felt the remarkable contradictions in the character of the famous hero (Hector), and yet none of them have ventured to suggest the real explanation. Even Muir and Mr. Gladstone confess that in our Iliad he is wholly inexplicable and incomprehensible; "he is paid off," say they, "with generalities, while in actual encounter he is hardly equal to the second rate Greek heroes." Yet why is he so important all through the plot of the poem? Why is his death by Achilles made an achievement of the highest order? Why are the chiefs who at one time challenge and wound him at another quailing with fear at his approach? Simply because in the original plan of the Iliad he was a great warrior, and because these perpetual defeats by Diomede and Ajax, this abundance of Agamemnon, this swearing and "lecturing" which we now find in him, were introduced by the enlargers and interpolators in order to enhance the merits of their favourites at his expense. It seems to me certain that originally the Hector of the Iliad was really superior to all the Greek except Achilles, that upon the retirement of the latter he made short work of them than the later compositors liked to admit, that he soon burnt the fleet and appeared at the ships, that Patroclus was slain there after a brief diversion, and that in this way the whole tactical scheme was very much more precipitated than we now find it. Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 75.

Hector, Mrs. (Annie French): pseudonym Mrs. Alexander. Born at Dublin, 1825. A British novelist, author of "The Wooing O't" (1873), "Ralph Wilton's Weird" (1875), "Her Dearest Foe" (1876), "The Freres" (1882), "At Bay" (1885), "Mona's Choice" (1887), etc.

Hector, or Ector, de Mares, Sir. The brother of Sir Lancelot, and one of the knights of the Round Table.

Hector of Germany, The. A surname of Joachim II. of Brandenburg.

Hecuba (hek'ū-bā). [Gr. Ἑκάβη.] In Greek legend, the second wife of Priam, daughter of Dymas of Phrygia (according to others of Cisseus). She is associated after the fall of Troy with the sacrifice of her daughter Polyxena; and saw the body of her last son, Polydorus, whom was murdered by Polymestor, washed to her feet by the waves. On the murderer she took vengeance by slaying his children and tearing out his eyes.

Hecuba. A tragedy of Euripides, exhibited in 425 B. C. It portrays the misfortunes of Hecuba, widow of Priam, king of Troy, the sacrifice of her daughter Polyxena at the grave of Achilles, the murder of her son Polydorus by Polymestor, and the vengeance executed by her upon the latter.

His chief work is "Konziliengeschichte" ("History of Church Councils," 1855–70).

Heffernan (hef'er-nan). Mr. Michael. The pseudonym of Samuel Ferguson, under which he wrote "Father Tom and the Pope, or a Night at the Vatican."

Hegel (hā'gel), Georg Wilhelm Friedrich. Born at Stuttgart, Würtemberg, Aug. 27, 1770; died at Berlin, Nov. 14, 1831. A celebrated German philosopher. He was professor at Jena in 1805; edited a political journal at Bamberg 1806–08; was rector of the gymnasium at Nuremberg 1808–16; was professor of philosophy at Heidelberg 1816–18; and succeeded Fichte at Berlin in 1818. His philosophical system was during the second quarter of the 19th century the leading system of metaphysical thought in Germany. It purports to be a complete philosophy, undertaking to explain the whole universe of thought and being in its abstracted elements and minutest details. This it does by means of the Hegelian dialectic, a new logic, the real law of the movement of thought (not a mere form, like syllogistic), the scheme of which is thesis, antithesis, synthesis, the original tendency, the opposing tendency, and their unification in a new movement. By this law the conceptions of logic develop themselves in a long series. This law of the development of thought is assumed to be necessarily the law of the development of being, on the ground that thought and being are absolutely identical. Hegelianism is radically hostile to natural science, and especially to the Newtonian philosophy—that is, to all the methods and scientific results which have sprung from the "Principia." One of the characteristics of Hegelianism is its constant readiness to recognize continuity both as a fact and as acceptable to reason, which other metaphysical systems have often struggled to deny. He published "Phanomenologie des Geistes" (1807), "Wissenschaft der Logik" ("Science of Logic," 1812–16), "Encyklopadie der philosophischen Wissenschaften" ("Encyclopedia of Philosophic Sciences," 1817), "Grundlinien der Philosophie des Rechts" (1821), etc. His complete works, including those on the philosophy of religion, esthetics, the philosophy of history, and the history of philosophy, were published in 18 volumes (1832–44).

Hegel, Karl. Born at Nuremberg, Bavaria, June 7, 1813. A German historian, son of G. W. F. Hegel; professor of history at Rostock (1841), and later (1856) at Erlangen. His chief work is "Geschichte der Städteverfassung von Italien" (1847).

Hegesippus (hej-es-sip'us). [Gr. Ἡγήσιππος.] Died 180 A.D. The earliest historian of the Christian church. He was a Jew by birth, but embraced Christianity, and lived at Rome in 160. He wrote a history of the Christian church from the passion of Christ down to his own time, fragments of which are extant.

Hegeso (hē-jē'sō). Monument of. [Gr. Ἡγησώ.] A monument in Athens, on the Street of Tombs, remarkable for the beauty of its relief-stele of the 4th century B. C., which is sculptured with a graceful seated woman attended by a slave.

The country, called Uhehe, is moderately mountainous, and strewn with great boulders. The Waheheare strong and warlike, using assagais and elliptic shields. They own cattle, but hardly cultivate. Their head chief is (1894) Mkumaika. His capital, Kuirenga, is surrounded by a quadrangular stockade.

Heiberg (hī'berg), Johann Ludvig. Born at Copenhagen, Dec. 14, 1791; died there, Aug. 25, 1860. A Danish dramatist and poet. He was the son of the dramatist and poet Peter Andreas Heiberg (1758–1841), who, in consequence of several offenses against the press law of 1799, was forced to leave Denmark in 1800, and fled to France, where he remained until his death. The younger Heiberg was educated in Denmark, studying at the Copenhagen University, where he took the doctor's degree in 1817. The same year he went to Paris, and lived there with his father until 1822, when he was appointed lecturer at the University of Kiel. In 1825 he returned to Copenhagen, and wrote a number of the vaudevilles that have made his name famous throughout the Danish drama. The most important of these are "Kong Salomon og Jørgen Hattemager" ("King Solomon and Jorgen the Hatter," performed 1826), "Recensenten og Digteren" ("The Critic and the Beast"), "De Usynlige" ("The Inseparable Ones"). After 1827 he edited the weekly journal "Den flyvende Post" ("The Flying Post") and subsequently the "Intelligensblade." In 1828 appeared the national drama, the most important of his greater plays, "Elverhøi" ("The Elf Hill"). In 1829 he was made professor of æsthetics at the University. The following year he was appointed docent in the new military academy, which post he held until 1836. From 1849 to 1856 he was the sole director of the royal theatre. Besides his dramatic works and the esthetic criticism contained in the journals mentioned, he wrote many lyric poems and romances. His poetical works, "Prosaiske Skrifter," appeared at Copenhagen in 1862 in 11 vols.; his prose "Prosaiske Skrifter," at Copenhagen 1861–62, also in 11 vols.

Heidegger (hī'dek-ėr), John James. Born at Zurich in 1659 (?); died at Richmond, Surrey, Sept. 5, 1749. A noted theatrical manager. He managed the Haymarket with Handel 1720–34.

Heidelberg (hī'del-berg). A city in the district of Mannheim, situated on the Neckar 12 miles southeast of Mannheim. It has considerable trade, and is celebrated for its picturesque surroundings. The castle is a famous monument founded at the end of the 13th century by the count palatine Rudolf I., and enlarged and strengthened by succeeding electors. During the 30th century it received the architectural development which, despite disaster, makes it still one of the richest productions of German Renaissance. It was lost and 1693 it was ruined by the generals of Louis XIV., but was subsequently restored. It was finally destroyed by fire from a lightning-stroke in 1764. The ruins are the most imposing in Germany. The picturesque outer walls and towers, now broken and ivy-clad, inclose a large area; but the chief architectural attractions are grouped about the inner court. The Otto Heinrichs Bau, dating from 1556, is the finest example of the early German Renaissance. It consists at present of a single façade of basement, with engaged columns and entablatures, and continuous ranges of ornate windows with central mullion. The doorway, surmounted by armorial bearings, is very richly treated: its two columns are of Corinthian order and arcuated. The Friedrich-Bau, of 1601, is a good example of late Renaissance work: it has 4 stories — Doric, Tuscan, Ionic, and Corinthian — with statues of emperors and electors in niches. This building is now in part restored as a museum. The university, founded by the elector Rupert I. in 1386 is the oldest in the present German Empire. From 1556 it came under the control of the leaders of the Reformation. The library was plundered and sent to Rome in 1623, and partially returned in 1816; it now consists of over 320,000 volumes. The university was reorganized by the elector Charles Frederick of Baden in 1803. Heidelberg was the capital of the Palatinate from the 13th century to 1720. It was sacked by Tilly in 1622, and by the French in 1693, and was nearly destroyed by the French in 1693. It passed to Baden in 1803. Population (1890), commune, 31,739.

Heiden (hī'den). A village and health-resort in the canton of Appenzell, Switzerland, 5 miles east of St.-Gall.

Heidenheim (hī'den-hām). A manufacturing town in the Jagst circle, Würtemberg, on the Brenz 44 miles east by south of Stuttgart. Population (1890), commune, 8,001.

Heidenmauer (hī'den-mou-er). A stone rampart on the summit of the Kastanienberg, near Dürkheim, Palatinate, Germany, probably of ancient Teutonic origin, noted in legend and fiction; also other similar prehistoric or Roman remains.

Heidenmauer, The. A novel by Cooper, published in 1832.

Heijn (hīn), Pieter Pieterse. Born at Delftshaven, Netherlands, 1577: died 1629. A Dutch admiral. He served as vice-admiral in the fleet of Admiral Wiebken at the capture of San Salvador, Brazil, in 1624: defeated the Spaniards in a bloody naval battle in All Saints' Bay, Brazil, in 1626; and captured the Spanish silver fleet, with treasure valued at 12,000,000 gulden, in the Bay of Matanzas, Cuba, two years later. He was subsequently placed at the head of the Dutch navy by the stadtholder Frederick Henry, and was killed while blockading Dunkirk in 1629.

Heilbronn (hīl-bron'). A town in the Neckar circle, Würtemberg, situated on the Neckar 26 miles north of Stuttgart. It has important manufactures and commerce. The Rathaus, church of St. Kilian, and Deutscher Haus are of interest. It was formerly a free imperial city. Population (1890), commune, 29,941.

Heilbronn, Union of. An alliance between the Swedes and the German Protestants for the prosecution of the war against the Imperialists, concluded at Heilbronn in 1633.

Heil dir im Siegerkranz (hīl dēr im zē'ger-kränz). [G., 'hail to thee in the conqueror's wreath.'] The Prussian national hymn. It was written by Heinrich Harries in 1790 as a song for the birthday of Christian VII. of Denmark, adapted to the English air "God save Great George the King," and was arranged in its present form for Prussia use by B. G. Schumacher in 1795.

Heiligenstadt (hī'lig-en-stät). A town in the province of Saxony, Prussia, situated on the Leine 27 miles east by north of Cassel. It was the capital of the old principality of Eichsfeld. Population (1890), commune, 6,185.

Heilsberg (hīls'berg). A town in the province of East Prussia, Prussia, situated on the Alle 39 miles south of Königsberg. An indecisive battle was fought here between the French under Soult and the Russians under Bennigsen, June 10, 1807. Population (1890), 5,501.

Heilsbronn, or Kloster-Heilsbronn (klōs'ter-hils-bron'). A small town in Middle Franconia, Bavaria, 15 miles southwest of Nuremberg. It contains the remains of a medieval Cistercian abbey.

Heim (hām). François Joseph. Born at Belfort, France, Dec. 16, 1787; died at Paris, Oct. 2, 1865. A French historical painter.

Heimdall (hīm'dāl). [ON. Heimdallr.] In Old Norse mythology, the guardian against the giants of the bridge of the gods, Bifröst, at the end of which he dwelt in Himinbjörg. He was the son of the nine daughters of the sea-gods Ægir and Rán. He possessed the trumpet Gjallarhorn, with which the gods were finally summoned together at Ragnarök, when he and Loki slew each other. As his name and his attributes indicate, he was a god of light.

This god is briefly described by Vigfusson and Powell as follows: "An ancient god is Heimdal, from whom the Aasaa spring. There are extant but myths connected with him: his struggle with Loki for the Brisinga necklace; the fight in which they fought in the shape of seals. He is 'the gods' watchman,' dwelling on the gods' path, the Rainbow. There he sits, 'the white god,' 'the wind-listening god,' whose ears are so sharp that he hears the grass grow in the fields and the wool on the sheep's backs, with his Blast-horn, whose trumpet-sound will ring through the nine worlds, for in the later legends he has some of the attributes of the Angel of the Last Trumpet. His teeth are of gold; his horse is 'stud-eared.'" Curious genealogical myths attach themselves to him. He is styled the son of nine mothers; and as Rig's father, or Rig himself, the 'walking or wandering god,' he is the father of men and the sire of kings, and of earls and carls and thralls alike. His own name is epithetic, perhaps the World-bow. The meaning of Hallinskíði [another name of his] is obscure." Such is a summary of the most important passages referring to Heimdal. Rhys, Celtic Heathendom, p. 82.

Heimskringla (hims'kring-lä). [ON. heimr, world, and kringla, circle.] The history of the Norse kings, from the earliest mythical times down to the battle of Re in 1177, written by the Icelander Snorri Sturluson (1178–1241). It receives its name from its first words, "Kringla heimsins," the circle of the world. In subject-matter and literary style it is the most important prose work in Old Norse literature.

Heine (hī'ne), Heinrich. Born at Düsseldorf, Prussia, Dec. 13, 1797; died at Paris, Feb. 17, 1856. A celebrated German lyric poet and critic, of Hebrew descent. Destined for a business career, he was sent against his own desire, to his uncle Solomon Heine, a banker in Hamburg; but through the latter's assistance he was enabled to study jurisprudence at Bonn, Berlin, and Göttingen. In 1825 he embraced Christianity. He lived alternately in Hamburg, Berlin, and Munich. After 1831 until his death he lived for the most part in Paris, during the last years of his life a great sufferer from an incurable malady. From 1837 to 1845 he received an annuity from the department of foreign affairs. The first collection of his poems, "Gedichte," appeared in 1822, his "Buch des Liedes" ("Book of Songs") in 1827, "Neue Gedichte" ("New Poems") in 1844, and "Romanzero" in 1851. Among his songs are some of the best-known lyrics of Germany, for instance, "Die Lorelei," "Du bist wie eine Blume," "Anno 1829," "Belsazer," and "Grenadier." He also left a number of characteristic prose works, the most celebrated of which, the "Reisebilder" ("Pictures of Travel"), had appeared in 4 parts from 1826 to 1831. The "Romantische Schule," to which Heine himself as a writer preeminently belonged, appeared in 1836. His complete works appeared in Hamburg 1861–63, in 21 volumes.

Helen (hel'en). [Gr. Ἑλένη, L. Helena: hence It. Elena, Sp. Helena, Elena, F. Hélène, E. Helen, Ellen, Eleanor.] 1. In Greek legend, the wife of Menelaus and the cause of the Trojan war. Tradition, the daughter of Zeus and Leda, or, according to another, of Zeus and Nemesis, celebrated for her beauty. Her abduction by Paris was the cause of the Trojan war. Goethe introduces her in the second part of "Faust," and Faustus, in Marlowe's play of that name, addresses her thus:

"Oh! thou art fairer than the evening air
Clad in the beauty of a thousand stars!"

Helen of Troy is one of those characteristics of the fancy over which time, change, and circumstance, and moral probability, exert no sway. . . . She moves through Greek lyric legend as the desired of all men and the possessed of many. Theseus bore her away while yet a child; upon her brethren, Castor and Polydeukes, recovered her from Athens by force, and gave to her Æthra, the mother of Theseus, for bondwoman. . . . She was at last assigned in wedlock to Menelaus, by whom she conceived her only earthly child, Hermione. Paris, by aid of Aphrodite, won her love and fled with her to Egypt and to Troy. In Troy she abode more than twenty years, and was the mate of Deïphobus after the death of Paris. When the strife raised for her sake was ended, Menelaus restored her with honor to his home in Lacedæmon. She received Telemachus and saw her daughter mated to Neoptolemus. But even after death she rested not from the service of love. The great Achilles, who in life had died for her beauty, had never seen her, clasped her among the shades upon the island Leukê, and begat Euphorion.

Saunders, Studies of the Greek Poets, I. 124.

He is the author also of a number of other works, including "De parallaxi solis" (1759).

Hellada. The modern name of the Spercheius.

Helladians (he-lā'di-ąnz). See the extract.

Otherwise while Greek was fast becoming the dominant speech of the Empire, the name of Hellas became a geographical expression, the name of a single theme of the Empire, while the name of Hellenes meant only professors of the fallen faith, whose temples supplied materials for building the temples of the new. When the people of the theme of Hellas gathered a province a little wider than the theme of Hellas, needed a geographical name, the new name of Helladians was evolved to express them. Freeman, Hist. Essays, III. 331.

Hellanicus (hel-a-nī'kus). [Gr. Ἑλλάνικος.] An eminent Greek biographer. He was a native of Mytilene, Lesbos, and lived about 450 B. C. Nothing is known with certainty of his personal history. According to an evidently erroneous account by Suidas he lived with Herodotus at the court of Amyntas. The same doubtful authority states that he died at Perperene, on the coast of Asia Minor, opposite Lesbos. He was a prolific writer, and was held in high esteem by the ancients. His works, fragments only of which are extant, included a history of Attica, a history of the Æolians in Asia Minor and the islands of the Ægean, and a history of Persia, Media, and Assyria from the time of Ninus to his own day.

Henriquez de Almansa (an-re'kaz dā äl-män'sȧ), Martin. Born in Alcañizes, Spain, about 1525; died at Lima, Peru, March 15, 1582. A Spanish ecclesiastical leader. He was the second son of a Maquis of Alcañizes. He was viceroy of Mexico Nov. 5, 1568, to Oct. 4, 1580, during which period the Inquisition was introduced (1570), and the great cathedral of Mexico was completed (1575). From 1581, to 1584, he was viceroy of Peru. He was an excellent ruler.

Henriquez de Guzman (göth-män'), Luis. Born about 1600; died about 1667. A Spanish administrator. He was count of Alba de Liste and grandee of Spain. He was viceroy of Peru June 28, 1640, to Aug. 1, 1663, and of Peru Feb. 24, 1655, to July 31, 1666. His reign in both countries was rather uneventful. He was just and prudent, and especially learning.

Henriquez de Rivera (ré-vä'rȧ), Payo. Born at Seville about 1610; died April 8, 1684. A Spanish prelate and statesman. He was a member of the Augustine order; was chosen bishop of Guatemala in 1657, and was preconized in 1658; declined it, but before reaching his new diocese was made archbishop of Mexico (1668). From Dec., 1673, to Oct., 1680, he was also viceroy. Returning to Spain, 1683, he was appointed president of the Council of the Indies, and bishop of Cuenca, but resigned both offices and died in a convent.

Henry (hen'ri) I. [The E. name Henry, formerly also Henrie, Henri, assimilated Herry, now Harry, is from OF. and F. Henri, Sp. Enrique, Pg. Henrique, It. Arrigo, from ML. Henricus, from OHG. Heurich, etc., Heimrich, D. Hendrik, etc., chief of the dwelling.] King of Castile 1214–June, 1217, son of Alfonso VIII. and Eleonore, daughter of Henry II. of England.

Henry II. Born 1333; died in May, 1379. King of Castile 1369–79, natural son of Alfonso XI. He was known before his accession as count of Trastamara, and ascended the throne by expelling his half-brother, Pedro the Cruel, with the aid of the celebrated captain Du Guesclin.

Henry III., surnamed "The Sickly." Born 1379; died 1406. King of Castile 1390–1406, son of John I. He married Catharine, daughter of John, duke of Lancaster, in 1388, and in 1402 recognized Benedict XIII. as pope in opposition to Boniface.

Henry IV., surnamed "The Impotent." Born at Valladolid, Spain, Jan. 6, 1425; died at Madrid, Dec. 12, 1474. King of Castile 1454–74, son of John II. He married Joanna of Portugal, the legitimacy of whose daughter, Joanna, was questioned by the Cortes. He therefore adopted as his heiress his sister Isabella of Castile, who married Ferdinand of Aragon in 1469.

Henry I., surnamed Beauclerc. [F., 'fine scholar.'] Born at Selby (?), Yorkshire, 1068; died Dec. 1, 1135. King of England 1100–35, fourth son of William the Conqueror and Matilda. He was elected on the death of William II., by the witan during the absence of his elder brother Robert, duke of Normandy, on crusade. He restored the laws of Edward the Confessor, as modified by the Conqueror, so called Anselm (see Anselm), and suppressed the great feudatories, for whom he substituted a class of lesser nobles. He conquered Normandy in 1106 by the victory of Tenchebrai over Robert, who was kept in captivity until his death (1134). He was twice married: first to Matilda, daughter of Malcolm of Scotland, and afterward to Adela, or Adelaide, daughter of Godfrey VII., count of Louvain. His only son, William (born of the first marriage), was drowned in the White Ship in the Channel in 1120.

Henry II. Born in 1133; died July 6, 1189. The first king of England of the house of Anjou (Plantagenet), 1154–89, son of Geoffrey Plantagenet, count of Anjou, and Matilda, daughter of Henry I. He claimed the English throne in right of his mother, who had been deprived of the succession by Stephen of Blois. In 1153 he was adopted by Stephen as his successor by the treaty of Wallingford, and acceded to the throne on Stephen's death, Oct. 24, 1154. His possessions outside of England included Normandy and the suzerainty of Brittany, inherited from the Norman kings; Anjou and Maine, inherited from his father; and Poitou, Guienne, and Gascony, acquired by marriage with Eleanor of Aquitaine (1152). He compelled Malcolm of Scotland to restore the English counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland, granted to Malcolm's brother by Stephen, and to do homage for the Scottish crown (1157); reduced the Welsh to obedience in 3 expeditions (1158, 1163, and 1165); and conquered the southeastern part of Ireland (1171). He consolidated and centralized the royal authority by the institution of fiscal, judicial, and military reforms, the chief of which were the improvement of the coinage (1158), the assignment of regular circuits to itinerant justices, the great assize or trial by a jury of twelve knights (which superseded the old modes of trial, like trial by battle), and the reorganization of personal military service for a money payment or scutage (1159), the revival of the an lent fyrd or national militia by the assize of arms (1181), and the extension of the jurisdiction of the secular courts to clerical offenders by the Constitutions of Clarendon (1164). His reforms were vehemently opposed by Thomas Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, who, on the final rupture, in 1164, fled to France after the unauthorized murder of the archbishop by four of Henry's knights (Dec. 29, 1170), and Henry's consequent penance (July 12, 1174). Rebellion of his sons and wife implicated his point. In the last year of his reign a rebellion broke out under his sons Richard and John, assisted by Philip of France, during which he died.

Henry III. (of Winchester). Born at Winchester, Oct. 1, 1207; died at Westminster, Nov. 16, 1272. King of England 1216–72, son of John and Isabella of Angoulême. He succeeded at the age of 9 years, under the regency of William Marshal, earl of Pembroke. In 1227 he was deprived by Louis VIII. of Philip of France, who had been chosen king by the barons opposed to John. The regent defeated Louis's army at Lincoln May 20, 1217, and compelled him to abandon his claim by the treaty of Lambeth Sept. 11. Other risings and reinforcements in a naval battle off Dover, Aug. 24, 1217. After the death of Pembroke in 1231, the government was entirely in the hands of Hubert de Burgh, appointed by Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, until 1232, when Henry personally assumed the direction of affairs. He married Eleanor of Provence, Jan. 14, 1236. The French possessions of his house, he retained only Aquitaine and Gascony. His misgovernment and the favoritism which he showed toward foreigners provoked a rising of the barons, who compelled him to sign the Provisions of Oxford in 1258, whereby a series of reforms were carried out by a commission of 24 barons. Henry subsequently repudiated the Provisions of Oxford, and the barons arose in arms under Simon de Montfort, and defeated the king at the battle of Lewes May 14, 1264. He was kept a virtual prisoner by the victorious barons until the battle of Evesham, Aug. 4, 1265, when he was rescued by his son Edward.

Henry IV. Born at the castle of Bolingbroke, near Spilsby, Lincolnshire, April 3, 1367; died at Westminster, March 20, 1413. The first king of England of the house of Lancaster, 1399–1413, son of John of Gaunt (fourth son of Edward III.) by Blanche of Lancaster. Richard II. was banished by Richard II. in 1398; succeeded his father as duke of Lancaster in 1399, and in the same year returned to England and captured and imprisoned Richard, who died (probably murdered) in Pontefract Castle. In 1400 he put down a serious rising under Harry Percy (Hotspur) at the battle of Shrewsbury, July 21, 1403, in which Percy was killed.

Henry V. (of Monmouth). Born at Monmouth, probably Aug. 9, 1387; died at Vincennes, Aug. 31, 1422. King of England 1413–22, son of Henry IV. and Mary, daughter of Humphrey de Bohun, earl of Hereford. He is said on doubtful authority to have been wild and dissolute in his youth, and is so represented by Shakspere. As king he showed himself able and brave. He invaded France in 1415; gained the brilliant victory of Agincourt Oct. 25, 1415; married Catharine of France June 2, 1420; and concluded the peace of Troyes May 21, 1420, by which he was accepted by the French as regent and heir of France.

Henry VI. (of Windsor). Born at Windsor, Dec. 6, 1421; died at London, May 21, 1471. King of England 1422–61, son of Henry V. and Catharine of France. He succeeded to the throne at the age of not quite 9 months, under the protectorship of his uncle John, duke of Bedford, the protectorship being exercised by Richard's brother Humphrey, duke of Gloucester, during Bedford's absence as regent in France. He was crowned king of France at Paris Dec. 16, 1430, in consequence of the peace of Troyes (see Henry V.), but by 1453 had lost all his possessions in France except Calais, in consequence of the successes of Joan of Arc and Charles VII. He married Margaret, daughter of René, titular king of Naples and Jerusalem, April 23, 1445. In 1453 he was stricken with insanity, and a contest for the regency ensued between Queen Margaret (supported by the Duke of Somerset) and Richard, duke of York. The Duke of York prevailed, but fell into disgrace on the recovery of Henry in 1454. He thereupon advanced claims to the throne as the descendant of Lionel, eldest brother of Henry's ancestor, John of Gaunt, both of whom were sons of Edward III. War broke out in 1455 (see Wars of the Roses and Edward IV.), and, after many fluctuations of fortune, Henry was deposed by York's son, who was proclaimed king as Edward IV., March 4, 1461. Arising under the Earl of Warwick against Edward in 1470 restored Henry, who had been imprisoned since 1465; but he was recaptured in the same year, and, after the final defeat of his party at the battles of Barnet and Tewkesbury, was murdered, it is said, in the Tower of London.

Henry VII. Born at Pembroke Castle, Jan. 28, 1457; died at Richmond, April 21, 1509. The first king of England of the house of Tudor, 1485–1509, son of Edmund Tudor, earl of Richmond, and Margaret Beaufort, through whom he traced his descent from John of Gaunt, son of Edward III. He became head of the house of Lancaster on the death of Henry VI. in the Tower of London in 1471, and, as an object of jealousy to the kings of the house of York, spent the next years from 1471 to 1485 in exile, chiefly in Brittany. In 1485 he effected a landing in England, and, having gained the victory of Bosworth Field, Aug. 22, 1485, in which Richard III. fell, was crowned king Oct. 30, 1485. He married Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Edward IV., Jan. 18, 1486, whereby he united in his own person the titles of the houses of Lancaster and York. He defeated the impostor Lambert Simnel (who personated the Earl of Warwick) at Stoke-upon-Trent June 16, 1487, and Nov. 24, 1490 executed the pretender Perkin Warbeck, who personated the Duke of York. Lord Audley defeated the rebel Thomas Flammock at Blackheath June 17, 1497. Henry married his son Arthur to Catharine of Aragon Nov. 14, 1501, and his eldest daughter Margaret to James IV. of Scotland in 1502. The Statute of Drogheda, or Poynings's Law, was passed in 1495, and the Cabots discovered North America in 1497. Henry's distinguishing characteristic was his avarice. He accumulated a fortune of £2,000,000, being aided in his exactions by his agents Empson and Dudley.

Henry VIII. Born at Greenwich, June 28, 1491; died at Westminster, Jan. 28, 1547. King of England 1509–47, son of Henry VII. and Elizabeth of York. He ascended the throne on the death of his father April 22, 1509, and June 11, 1509, married Catharine of Aragon, widow of his brother Arthur. He joined the Holy League (which he soon deserted) of Julius II. 1511, he took personal charge of the war in France, and gained with the emperor Maximilian the victory of Guinegate (called the Battle of the Spurs), Aug. 16, 1513. During his absence James IV. of Scotland began war on England in favor of France, and was defeated and killed at Flodden Sept. 9, 1513. He made his favorite Cardinal Wolsey lord chancellor in 1515, and Francis I. of France and Henry VIII. of France near Calais at the Field of the Cloth of Gold. In 1521 he wrote the Assertio Septem Sacramentorum" against Luther, which gained for him the title of Defender of the Faith from Pope Leo X. After the capture of Francis by the Imperialists at Pavia, he concluded an alliance with France and war against the emperor (see Charles V., Aug. 30, 1525). In 1527 he instituted proceedings for a divorce from Catharine, alleging the invalidity of marriage with a deceased brother's wife, although a papal dispensation had been specially obtained. Annoyed at Wolsey's failure to obtain a decree for the divorce from the Pope, he dismissed him from the chancellorship, and bestowed it on Sir Thomas More (1529). At the instance of Cranmer, he obtained opinions from English and foreign universities declaring the invalidity of the marriage and the incompetence of the Pope to grant a dispensation, and upon he secretly married Anne Boleyn (Jan. 25, 1533), while Cranmer (who had been made archbishop of Canterbury in 1532) declared the marriage with Catharine void (May 23, 1533) and that with Anne valid (May 28, 1533). In 1534, in consequence of the refusal of the Pope to grant the divorce, he procured the passage of the Act of Supremacy, which severed the connection of the English church with Rome and appointed the king and his successors protector and only supreme head of the church and clergy of England. More and Fisher died in 1535, for refusing to acknowledge the royal supremacy. At the instance of his new adviser Thomas Cromwell, who was made vicar-general or vicegerent in all matters ecclesiastical in 1535, he first suppressed the smaller (1536) and afterward (1539) the larger monasteries, whose property was confiscated. He beheaded Anne Boleyn on the charge of adultery May 19, 1536. He married Jane Seymour May 30, 1536 (she died Oct. 24, 1537). In 1539 he procured the enactment of the Statute of Six Articles (which see). He divorced Anne of Cleves Jan. 24, 1540. Anne's divorce and the execution of Cromwell followed in the same year, as well as a marriage with Catherine Howard, who was sent to the block on the charge of adultery Feb. 13, 1542. He married Catharine Parr July 12, 1543.

Henry IX., King of England. A title assumed by Cardinal York after the death of his brother, the "Young Pretender."

Henry I. Born about 1011: died Aug. 4, 1060. King of France 1051–60, son of Robert II.

Henry II. Born at St.-Germain-en-Laye, France, March 31, 1519; died at Paris, July 26, 1559. King of France 1547–59, son of Francis I. He married Catharine de' Medici in 1533; conquered the bishoprics of Metz, Toul, and Verdun from Germany in 1552; captured Calais and Guines, the last French possessions in France, in 1558; and was mortally wounded at a tournament in honor of the marriage of his daughter Elizabeth with Philip II. of Spain.

Henry III. Born at Fontainebleau, France, Sept. 19, 1551; died at St.-Cloud, Paris, Aug. 2, 1589. King of France 1574–89, third son of Henry II. and Catharine de' Medici. He was, while prince, styled Duc d'Anjou; defeated the Huguenots at Jarnac and Moncontour in 1569; was elected king of Poland in 1573; and succeeded his brother Charles IX. as king of France in 1574. He sought to maintain a balance of power between the Huguenots and the Roman Catholics, but the favorable peace which he granted to the former in 1576 (the paix de mauvaise) occasioned the formation of the Holy League by the Roman Catholics under Henry, duke of Guise, and compelled him to take sides with the Roman Catholic party. The death of his brother, the Duc d'Alençon, in 1584, caused the question of the succession to assume importance, as it left Henry of Navarre, the head of the Huguenot party, heir presumptive to the throne. The Holy League proclaimed the cardinal Charles de Bourbon heir presumptive, which brought on a renewal of the war with the Huguenots in 1585. The victory of Henry of Navarre at Coutras, Oct. 20, 1587, was followed by a conspiracy of the leading members of the League to depose the king, whose sincerity was mistrusted. Henry caused the assassination of the Duke of Guise and his brother, Louis de Lorraine, cardinal de Guise, but was forced to take refuge with Henry of Navarre, in whose camp at St.-Cloud he was murdered by the monk Jacques Clement.

Henry IV. Born at Pau, France, Dec. 14 (13?), 1553; died at Paris, May 14 (13?), 1610. King of France 1589–1610, son of Antoine de Bourbon, king of Navarre, and Jeanne d'Albret. He became the head of the Huguenot party on the death of the Prince de Condé in 1569; succeeded to the throne of Navarre in 1572; married Margaret of Valois, sister of Charles IX. of France, at Paris, Aug. 18, 1572; and escaped the general massacre of his partizans inaugurated on the 24th, during the nuptial festivities. (See St. Bartholomew, Massacre of.) The death of the Duc d'Alençon in 1584 left him their presumptive to the throne of France, but the Holy League refused to recognize his title, and proclaimed the cardinal Charles de Bourbon heir presumptive. War broke out in consequence in 1585. The cardinal was proclaimed king under the title of Charles X. by the League on the death of Henry III. in 1589; but after defeating the Leaguers under the Duke of Mayenne at Ivry, March 14, 1590, and embracing the Roman Catholic religion at St.-Denis, July 25, 1593, Henry secured the general recognition of the Roman Catholics, and was crowned at Chartres, Feb. 27, 1594, although the war was still continued by the League in alliance with Spain. He published the Edict of Nantes (which see) April 15, 1598, and concluded the peace of Vervins with Spain and the League, May 2, 1598, which ended the so-called Wars of the Huguenots. He was assassinated by the Roman Catholic fanatic Ravaillac.

Henry V. The name given by the French Legitimists to the Comte de Chambord. See Chambord, Henri.

Henry I., surnamed "The Fowler." Born 876: died at Memleben on the Unstrut, Prussian Saxony, July 2, 936. King of Germany 919–936, son of Otto, duke of Saxony. He was elected king on the death of Conrad I., and was the first of the Saxon line of the kings of Germany and emperors of the Holy Roman Empire. He reconstituted the German monarchy, enlarged and improved the old fortresses, and put an end to the inroads of the Hungarians, whom he defeated (probably) on May 15, 933.

Henry II., Saint. Born in Bavaria, May 6, 972 (973?): died at Grona, near Göttingen, Prussia, July 13, 1024. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Henry the Quarrelsome of Bavaria. He succeeded Otto III. as king of Germany in 1002, and was crowned emperor in 1014. He made two expeditions to Italy against Arduin, marquis of Ivrea, who had been elected king of Lombardy on the death of Otto. Arduin was overthrown in 1013.

Henry III., "The Black." Born Oct. 28, 1017: died at Botfeld, in the Harz, Germany, Oct. 5, 1056. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Conrad II. whom he succeeded as king of Germany in 1039. He curbed the power of the feudatories, reduced Peter of Hungary to the position of a vassal, and received from Rome deposed Queen Thebora, popes Sylvester III., Benedict IX., and Gregory VI., and appointed Clement II., by whom he was crowned emperor on Christmas day, 1046. He raised the imperial power to its highest point.

Henry IV. Born at Goslar, Prussia, Nov. 11, 1050: died at Liège, Belgium, Aug. 7, 1106. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Henry III. whom he succeeded as king of Germany in 1056. The principal occurrence of his reign was the struggle with Hildebrand (see Gregory VII.). He was crowned emperor in 1084 by Clement III., whom he had elevated to the papal see in opposition to Gregory. On the death of Gregory in 1085, his partizans elected Victor III., and Henry in 1089 made a new expedition to Italy to protect Clement. He was recalled in 1097 by the revolt of his son Conrad, who had allied himself with the papal party. Conrad died in 1101, but Henry's younger son, Henry, likewise allied himself with the papal party, and for a time imprisoned his father.

Henry V. Born in 1081: died at Nimwegen, Netherlands, May 23, 1125. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Henry IV. whom he succeeded as king of Germany in 1106. He was crowned emperor in 1111, and in 1122 concluded the Concordat of Worms (which see). He married Matilda, daughter of Henry I. of England, in 1114.

Henry VI. Born at Nimwegen, Netherlands, in 1165: died at Messina, Sicily, Sept. 28, 1197. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Frederick Barbarossa whom he succeeded as king of Germany in 1190. Having inherited the kingdom of the Two Sicilies through his wife Constance in 1189, he undertook an expedition to Italy in 1191 to rescue his inheritance from the usurper Tancred of Lecce: but was compelled to retire to Germany in the same year on receiving intelligence of the imprisonment of Richard I. of England. During this expedition he was crowned emperor at Rome. He subdued the Sicilies in two subsequent expeditions (1194 and 1195), and died as he was about to undertake a crusade to the Holy Land.

Henry VII. Born 1262: died at Buonconvento, near Siena, Italy, Aug. 24, 1313. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of the Count of Luxemburg whom he succeeded as king of Germany in 1308. He granted the Swiss cantons documentary confirmation of their immediate feudal relation to the empire and their consequent independence of Austria, in 1309. He was crowned emperor in 1312.

Henry I. Died in July, 1274. King of Navarre 1270–74.

Henry II. Born at Sanguesa, Spain, April, 1503: died at Pau, France, May 25, 1555. Titular king of Navarre. He was an unsuccessful claimant to the throne in 1521.

Henry III., King of Navarre. See Henry IV., King of France.

Henry I. Born at Lisbon, Jan. 31, 1512: died 1580. King of Portugal 1578–80.

Henry, Duc d'Anjou. See Henry III., King of France.

Henry, Prince of Portugal, surnamed "The Navigator." Born at Oporto, Portugal, March 4, 1394: died at Sagres, Portugal, Nov. 13, 1460. Youngest son of John I. of Portugal, distinguished for his encouragement of science and geographical discovery. His expeditions rounded Cape Bojador in 1433, discovered Madeira, the Azores, the Senegal, etc.

Henry, Prince of Prussia (G. Friedrich Heinrich Ludwig). Born at Berlin, Jan. 18, 1726: died at Rheinsberg, Prussia, Aug. 3, 1802. A Prussian general, brother of Frederick the Great, distinguished in the Seven Years' War, especially at Prague in 1757, and Freiberg in 1762.

Henry, surnamed "The Lion." Born probably at Ravensburg, Würtenberg, 1129: died at Brunswick, Germany, Aug. 6, 1195. Duke of Saxony and Bavaria. He succeeded as duke of Saxony in 1139; received Bavaria in 1155; was deposed and his dominions divided in 1180; and submitted to the emperor in 1181.

Henry of Ghent. Born near Ghent, Belgium, probably about 1217: died at Tournay, Belgium, 1293. A scholastic philosopher, surnamed "Doctor Solemnis" ("The Illustrious Doctor").

Henry of Huntingdon. Born about 1084: died 1155. An English historian. His early life was spent at Lincoln, and he became archdeacon of Huntingdon in 1109.

At the request of Alexander, bishop of Lincoln from 1123 to 1147 (Dict. Anglor. Princ.), he undertook an English history, following Bede by the bishop's advice, and extracting from other chroniclers. The first edition of this work was carried down to 1129, and he continued to add to it at various times, the last edition being brought down to 1154, the year of Stephen's death, which could not long have preceded his own. He was thus a near ecclesiastical contemporary in this part of his work. The early portion of Henry's "Historia Anglorum" is taken from the usual sources, the "Historia Miscella," "Aurelius Victor," "Eutropius," "Bede," and "Orosius," and his narrative is written completely anonymously with the events he describes. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Henry of Lancaster. Born about 1299: died at Leicester, May 13, 1361. An English noble, son of Henry, earl of Lancaster (1281(?)–1345). He commanded under Edward III. in Scotland in 1336; was created earl of Derby in 1337; fought under Edward at Crecy; took part in the sea-fight before Sluys; was appointed captain-general in Scotland in 1341; and was lieutenant and captain of Aquitaine May, 1345–Feb., 1347. Selected by Edward, Prince of Wales, Oct. 31, 1345, and gaining many other successes. In 1349 he was created earl of Lincoln, and appointed vice-regent of the duchy of Guienne and of the County of Poitou. In 1351 he was created duke of Lancaster, and made captain and admiral of the western fleet. He was engaged in numerous military operations and in diplomatic missions. Among his contemporaries he was known as a model of knighthood.

Henry of Lausanne; also called Henry of Cluny, Henry the Deacon, Henry the Hermit, etc. Died about 1148. A French itinerant preacher and religious reformer, founder of the sect of the Henricians.

Henry of Marlborough. Flourished about 1420. An English chronicler. He was a chaplain in Dublin, and held the office of Balscaddan and Deanbote in Dublin County. His annals in Latin cover the history of England and Ireland for the period 1133–1421.

Henry of Trastamare. See Henry II., King of Castile.

Henry IV. A historical play, in 2 parts, by Shakspere. It was founded on an old play, "The Famous Victories of Henry V." The first part was produced in 1597 and printed in 1598; the second part was produced in 1598 and printed in 1600. Dowe.

Henry V. A historical play by Shakspere, acted in 1599 (Fleay). The material was taken from "The Famous Victories of Henry V.," and with the two previous plays completes a trilogy.

Henry VI. A historical play in 3 parts. The first part was acted as a new play in 1592. It was evidently written in 1589–90 by several hands with no unity in the Shakspere. The authors have been said to be Marlowe, Kyd, Peele, and Lodge, and perhaps Greene. (Fleay.) The second part is a transcript of a play written about 1580 and published in 1594 as "The First Part of the Contention between the two Famous Houses of York and Lancaster." It is thought to have been written by Greene, Peele, Marlowe, and Lodge, some of it being rewritten by Shakspere (Fleay) and altered by some illiterate actor. The third part followed, "The true Tragedie of Richard Duke of York, and the Death of Good King Henry the Sixt, etc.," which was the second part of "The Contention," probably mostly by Marlowe, with touches by Shakspere. These three plays were placed by Heminge and Condell in the first collected edition of Shakspere's plays in 1623.

Henry VIII. A historical play, partly by Shakspere, who appears to have left it unfinished, the rest being by Fletcher and Massinger. It is founded on Holinshed's "Chronicle" and Foxe's "Christian Martyrs," and was produced in 1613. As we have it, it is not the play of that name that was being acted when the Globe Theatre was burned in the same year.

Henry, Joseph. Born at Albany, N. Y., Dec. 17, 1797: died at Washington, D. C., May 13, 1878. An American physicist, especially noted for his researches in electromagnetism. He became secretary of the Smithsonian Institution (Washington) in 1846. Among his works are "Contributions to Electricity and Magnetism" (1839). His collected works were published in 1886.

Henry, Matthew. Born at Broad Oak, Flintshire, Wales, Oct. 18, 1662: died at Nantwich, England, June 22, 1714. An English biblical commentator, son of Philip Henry. He became a nonconformist minister at Hackney in 1687, and removed to Hackney. His best work is the "Exposition of the Old and New Testament" (1708–10). He also wrote "A Method for Prayer" (1710), etc.

Henry, Patrick. Born at Studley, Hanover County, Va., May 29, 1736: died at Red Hill, Charlotte County, Va., June 6, 1799. A celebrated American orator and patriot. He was the son of John Henry, a Scotchman, and Sarah Winston, a descendant of the English family of that name. He was admitted to the bar in 1760. In 1765 he entered the Virginia House of Burgesses, and immediately became the leader in Virginia of the political agitation which preceded the American Revolution. He introduced the famous resolutions declaring the Stamp Act unconstitutional, May 29, 1765, and in May, 1773, was associated with Thomas Jefferson, R. H. Lee, and Dabney Carr in the introduction of the resolution establishing a committee of correspondence for intercourse with the other colonies. He was a prominent member of the Continental Congress of 1774, and of the Virginia Convention of 1775. He was governor of Virginia 1776–79 and 1784–86, and in 1788 was a member of the Ratifying Convention, where he acted with the Anti-Federalists.

Henry, Philip. Born at London, Aug. 24, 1631: died at Broad Oak, Flintshire, June 24, 1696. An English nonconformist divine. His diaries were published in 1882.

Henry, Robert. Born at Muirton, Stirlingshire, Feb. 18, 1718: died at Edinburgh, Nov. 24, 1790. A Scottish historian, author of a "History of England" (1771–93).

Henry and Emma. A poem by Prior upon the model of the old ballad "The Nut Brown Maid."

Henry Clay (hen'ri klā). An American trotting stallion, the founder of the Clay family of trotters. He was by Andrew Jackson, by Grand Bashaw, a supposed Arabian imported from Algiers.

Henry Esmond (hen'ri ez'mond). A novel by Thackeray, published in 1852. The scene is laid in the time of Queen Anne. The book is a reproduction of the manners, thoughts, and literary style which prevailed in England at that period. Henry Esmond, the principal character, is a brave, polished, learned, and loyal gentleman, almost too self-sacrificing. He loves Beatrix Esmond, but finally marries her mother, Lady Castlewood. See Esmond, Beatrix.

Henryson (hen'ri-son), Robert. Born about 1430: died probably before 1500 (Morley). A Scottish poet. He wrote "Schoolmaster of Dunfermline," "Testament of Cresseid" (a sort of sequel to Chaucer's "Troilus and Cressida"), "Robene and Makyne" (said to be the earliest English pastoral), and "Fables" (Æsop, probably written between 1475 and 1480). The fables include "The Uplandis Mous and the Burges Mous" (The Country Mouse and the City Mouse).

His collected works were edited by D. Laing (1865).

Henry the Minstrel. See Harry, Blind.

Henschel (hen'shel), Georg. Born at Breslau, Feb. 18, 1850. A musical performer and conductor. He has a baritone voice and has made a reputation as a concert-singer. He married Isadora Bannon who also sings. He went to England in 1877. In 1881 he was appointed conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra. In 1885 he organized the London Symphony Concerts, and appeared for the first time in London as a conductor. From 1886 to 1888 he was professor of singing in Madame Goldschmidt's place at the Royal College of Music, London.

Hensel (hen'sel), Madame Fanny Cecile Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. Born at Hamburg, Nov. 14, 1805: died May 14, 1847. A pianist and composer, elder sister of Felix Mendelssohn, and wife (Oct. 3, 1829) of W. Hensel, a German painter. She published several books of songs.

Hensel, Wilhelm. Born at Trebbin, Prussia, July 6, 1794: died at Berlin, Nov. 26, 1861. A German historical painter. In 1828 he became court painter. He married Hensler's sister Mendelssohn.

Henselt (hen'selt), Adolf. Born at Schwabach, Bavaria, May 12, 1814: died at Warmbrunn, Silesia, Oct. 10, 1889. A noted German pianist. In 1838 he was made court pianist and teacher of the imperial children at St. Petersburg. He visited England in 1832 and 1867. His legato-playing was remarkable. Among his compositions are a concerto in F minor for the piano, concert studies, etc.

Henshaw (hen'shâ), John Prentiss Kewley. Born at Middletown, Conn., June 13, 1792: died near Frederick, Md., July 19 (20?), 1852. An American bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He became rector of St. Peter's, Baltimore, in 1817, and in 1827 became bishop of Rhode Island and rector of Grace Church, Providence. He published a number of theological works, including a volume of "Hymns" (5th ed. 1823).

Henslow (henz'lō). John Stevens. Born at Rochester, England, Feb. 6, 1796; died at Hitcham, Suffolk, May 16, 1861. An English botanist, professor of mineralogy at Cambridge 1822–27, and professor of botany 1827–61. He became rector of Hitcham in 1837. He wrote a "Catalogue of British Plants" (1820), "Principles of Descriptive and Physiological Botany" (1836), "A Dictionary of Botanical Terms" (1857), etc.

Henslowe (henz'lō). Philip. Died in 1616. An English theatrical manager. He began life as servant of the bailiff of Nonsuch Manor; rose from nowhere in Southwark. Henslowe took care of the property there, and gradually made money and bought property. He owned the Bear's Head and other inns. In 1585 he bought land on the Bankside, and in 1501 built the Rose Theatre there. In 1592 he began to keep the accounts of his theatrical ventures in his "Diary." In it he gives the dates of new plays and the sums he paid for them. This diary is of great value to students of the drama. In 1600 he, with Allevn, built the Fortune Theatre. His "Diary" was edited for the Shakespeare Society (1845).

Hentz (hents), Mrs. (Caroline Lee Whiting). Born at Lancaster, Mass., 1800; died at Marianna, Fla., Feb. 11, 1856. An American novelist. She wrote "Aunt Patty's Scrap-Bag" (1846), "The Mob Cap" (1848).

Henzada (hen-zā'dä). A district in the Pegu division, British Burma, intersected by lat. 17° 30′ N., long. 95° 30′ E. Area, about 4,000 square miles. Population, about 480,000.

Hepburn (hep'bėrn), James, fourth Earl of Bothwell. Born about 1536; died 1578. A Scottish noble, husband of Mary Queen of Scots. He took no part in the murder of Rizzio, and aided Mary, after that event, in her flight from Holyrood, and was her chief supporter. He was the principal in the assassination of Darnley; was tried for the murder, under circumstances which made his conviction practically impossible, and so acquitted. On April 24, 1567, while the queen was returning to Edinburgh, she was met by Bothwell, who, with a show of force, carried her to his castle of Dunbar. He obtained a divorce from his wife early in May, and married the queen soon after (May 15, 1567). They were divorced in 1570.

Hephæstion (he-fes'ti-on). [Gr. "Ηφαιστίων.] Lived in the 2d century. An Alexandrian grammarian, author of a work on Greek meters (edited by Gaisford 1810).

Hephæstion. Died at Ecbatana, 325 or 324 B. C. A Macedonian of Pella, the intimate friend and companion of Alexander the Great. He died of fever at Ecbatana, and was mourned by the conqueror with extravagant demonstrations of grief.

Hephæstus (he-fes'tus). [Gr. "Ηφαιστος.] In Greek mythology, the god of fire and metallic arts, son of Zeus and Hera, and one of the great Olympians; identified by the Romans with their Vulcan, who became assimilated to him. He was the creator of all that was beautiful and mechanically wonderful in Olympus. Volcanoes were held to be his smithy and their fires were his journeymen. In art he was represented as a bearded man, usually with the short sleeveless or one sleeved tunic (exomis) and the conical cap, and holding the smith's hammer and tongs.

Hephzibah (hef'zi-bä). [Heb., 'my delight is in her.'] The wife of Hezekiah, king of Judah; also, a name to be given to the restored Jerusalem (Isa. lxii. 4).

Heppenheim (hep'pen-hīm). A small town in the province of Starkenburg, Hesse-Darmstadt, 16 miles south of Darmstadt. Near it is the ruined castle of Starkenburg.

Heptameron (hep-tam'e-ron). [Irreg. from Gr. ἑπτά, seven, and ἡμέρα, day.] A book containing the transactions of seven days. The "Heptameron" of Margaret of Angoulême, queen of Navarre (1492–1549), is a collection of stories supposed to have been related during seven days, modeled on the "Decameron" of Boccaccio.

The exact authorship of this celebrated book is something of a literary puzzle. Marguerite was a prolific author, if all the works which were published under her name be unhesitatingly ascribed to her. Besides the poems printed under the pretty title of "Les Marguerites de la Marguerite," she wrote many other works, and the "Heptameron," which was not given to the world until after her death (1558), The house of Valois was by no means destitute of literary talent. But that which seems most likely to be the Queen's genuine work hardly corresponds with the remarkable power shown in the "Heptameron." On the other hand, Marguerite for years maintained a literary court, in which all the most celebrated men of the time, notably Marot and Bonaventure des Périers, held places. It is very allowable to decide literary questions simply by considerations of possibility. But it would be little hesitation in assigning the entire "Heptameron" to Des Périers himself, and then its unfinished condition would be intelligible enough. The general opinion of critics, however, is that it was probably the result of the joint work of the Queen, of Des Périers, and of a good many other men, and probably some women, of letters.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 190.

Heptanomis (hep-tan'ō-mis). [Gr. "Επτανομίς.] In ancient geography, the part of Egypt extending from about lat. 27° N. to the commencement of the Delta: nearly equivalent to Middle Egypt.

The Heptanomis, or region of the seven provinces or nomes, the northernmost part, is far broader and more productive than the Thebais, which takes its name from Thebes, the southernmost district. In the Heptanomis, about seventy miles by the river above Cairo, on the western bank, stood the city of Bauris. The site is marked by the extensive mounds around the Arab village of Ahnás-el-Medeeneh. 'Alnas the capital,' a name probably preserving the remembrance that in earlier times this was the chief town of a province. Poole, Cities of Egypt, p. 37.

Heptarchy (hep'tär-ki). [From Gr. ἑπτά, seven, and ἀρχή, rule.] A name formerly loosely given to the early English kingdoms prior to their consolidation. The number of them, however, was seldom exactly seven, and their union or confederation was partial and temporary. The chief kingdoms were Kent, Wessex, Mercia, East Anglia, Deira and Bernicia (united as Northumbria), and Sussex. See England.

Heptateuch (hep'ta-tūk). [From Gr. ἑπτά, seven, and τεῦχος, an implement, a book.] The first seven books of the Old Testament. The last two (Joshua and Judges) contain the history of the Jews in the promised land under the theocratic government historically developed in the preceding five (the Pentateuch).

Hepworth (hep'wėrth), George Hughes. Born at Boston, Mass., Feb. 4, 1833. An American clergyman, lecturer, and writer. He was pastor of the Church of the Unity in Boston 1858–70, and of the Church of the Messiah, New York city, 1870–72, when he abandoned the Unitarian and entered the Presbyterian church. He subsequently occupied the pulpit of the Church of the Disciples, and eventually accepted an appointment on the New York "Herald." He has written "The Whip, Rod, and Sword" (1864), "The Criminal, the Crime, the Penalty" (1865), etc.

Hera, or Here (hē'rä, -rē). [Gr. "Ηρα, "Ηρη.] In Greek mythology, the greatest feminine divinity of Olympus, queen of heaven, wife and sister of Zeus, and inferior in power to him alone. She was the type of virtuous womanhood, and of the wife and mother. In art she is represented as a majestic woman, fully clothed, sometimes diademed or veiled, with a crown on her brow, and bearing a long scepter. By the Romans Hera was early identified with their Juno, originally a distinct Italian goddess; the Latin name is often incorrectly given to the Greek goddess.

Heraclea (her-a-klē'ä). [Gr. "Ηράκλεια.] In ancient geography, a city of Magna Græcia, situated near the Gulf of Tarentum about lat. 40° 10′ N., long. 16° 41′ E., near the modern Policoro. It was a Tarentine colony, and was the scene of a victory of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, over the Romans 280 B. C.

Heraclea, surnamed "Minoa" (Gr. Μινῳα). In ancient geography, a city on the southern coast of Sicily, 18 miles west-northwest of Agrigentum.

Heraclean Tables (her-a-klē'an tā'blz), L. Tabulæ Heracleenses. Two fragmentary bronze tablets discovered near Heraclea in Magna Græcia about the middle of the 18th century, and preserved at Naples. They contain a Latin inscription (a copy of the "Lex Julia municipalis"), and also a fragment of Greek inscription.

Heraclea Perinthus. See Perinthus.

Heraclea Pontica (pon'ti-kä). In ancient geography, a city in Bithynia, Asia Minor, situated on the Black Sea in lat. 41° 18′ N., long. 31° 26′ E.: the modern Bender Erekli.

Heraclea Sintica (sin'ti-kä). In ancient geography, a town in Macedonia, situated about lat. 40° 54′ N., long. 23° 30′ E.: the modern Zeruokhori.

Heraclea Trachinia (tra-kin'i-ä). In ancient geography, a town in Malis, Greece, 10 miles west of Thermopylæ: a Spartan colony.

Heracleitus. See Heraclitus.

Heracleonites (he-rak'lē-on-its). The followers of Heracleon, a Valentinian Gnostic of the 2d century, noted as a commentator on the Gospel of John.

Heracles. See Hercules.

Heraclian (he-rak'li-an). Died at Carthage, 413 A. D. A Roman general. He assassinated Stilicho in 408 at the instance of the emperor Honorius, for which service he was rewarded with the office of count of Africa. He remained loyal to Honorius during the usurpation in 409 and 410 of Attalus, the creature of Alaric, but revolted in 413, in which year he made an unsuccessful invasion of Italy. He was killed at Carthage by emissaries of the emperor.

Heraclidæ (her-a-klī'dē). [Gr. "Ηρακλεῖδαι.] 1. The descendants of Heracles; specifically, in Greek legend, certain Achæan chiefs claiming descent from Heracles, who in prehistoric times joined the Dorian migration to the Peloponnesus. The sons of Heracles were said to have been expelled from their heritage in the Peloponnesus by Eurystheus, and to have settled in Attica. The most notable of their descendants who joined the Dorians were Temenus, who in the partition of the conquered territories obtained Argos; Proclus and Eurysthenes, who obtained Lacedæmon; and Cresphontes, who obtained Messenia. The invasion of the Peloponnesus by the Heraclidæ in alliance with the Dorians was commonly referred to as the return of the Heraclidæ.

2. A tragedy of Euripides, exhibited about 429 B. C. "It celebrates the honourable conduct of Athens in protecting the suppliant children of Heracles, and her victory over the insolent Argive king Eurystheus, who invades Attica to recover the fugitives. The play was obviously intended as a political document, directed against the Argive party in Athens during the Peloponnesian war." Mahaffy.

Heraclitus (her-a-klī'tus). [Gr. "Ηράκλειτος.] Born at Ephesus, probably about 535 B. C.: died there, probably about 475 B. C. A celebrated Greek philosopher.

Heraclius (her-a-klī'us). Born in Cappadocia, Asia Minor, about 575; died 641. Emperor of the East. He was the son of Heraclius, governor of Africa, and succeeded to the throne as the result of a conspiracy between his father and Crispus, the son-in-law of the emperor Maurice. In the early years of his reign the empire was terribly ravaged by the incursions of the Avars and the Persians. After having established the Croats and the Serbs in Illyricum as a barrier against the former about 620, he annihilated the power of the latter in a series of brilliant campaigns 622–628. The subsequent years of his reign were spent in an inexplicable inactivity, which resulted in the loss of Syria, Palestine, Mesopotamia, and Egypt to the caliphs.

Héraclius (ā-rā-klē-üs'). A play by Corneille, published in 1647.

Heras, Juan Gregorio de las. See Las Heras.

Herat (her-at'). 1. A territory in western Afghanistan, bordering on Persia.—2. A city of Afghanistan, situated near the river Hari Rud, in lat. 34° 22′ N., long. 62° 9′ E. It is a place of strategic and military importance, defended by a wall and earthwork, and has been called "the key of India." It was often captured in the middle ages; was successfully besieged by the Persians in 1837–38, and taken by them in 1856, and was taken by Dost Mohammed in 1863, and by Abdurrahman in 1885. It has undergone over 50 sieges. It is the center of a very fertile district, and is a natural emporium of trade. Population, about 30,000.

Hérault (ā-rō'). 1. A river in southern France, flowing into the Mediterranean 31 miles southwest of Montpellier. Length, about 100 miles.—2. A department of southern France. Capital, Montpellier. It is bounded by Lozère and Gard on the north, Gard on the east, the Mediterranean and Aude on the south, and Tarn on the west, corresponding to part of the ancient Languedoc. Among the leading products are oil and wine. Area, 2,393 square miles. Population (1891), 461,651.

Herbert (her'bėrt), Edward, Lord Herbert of Cherbury. Born about 1582: died at London, Aug. 20, 1648. An English philosopher, soldier, diplomatist, and historian. His chief work is "De veritate" ("On Truth," 1624).

Herbert, George. Born at Montgomery Castle, Wales, April 3, 1593: died at Bemerton, near Salisbury, Feb., 1633. An English poet, brother of Edward, Lord Herbert of Cherbury. He graduated B. A. at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1613, and M. A. in 1616, when he elected fellow. In 1618 he was prelector in the rhetoric school at Cambridge, and in 1619 he was made public orator. He was much in favor at court, and in his position as orator it was his duty to write all official letters to the government. This brought him much in contact with public men. In 1627 he resigned the post on account of ill health. In 1630 Charles I. presented him to the rectory of Fugglestone with Bemerton, Wiltshire. He repaired Bemerton church, which is said to be the smallest in England. It was restored by Wyatt in 1866. Here he wrote the religious poems for which he is principally remembered, and which were published after his death in a volume called "The Temple: Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations" (1633). In 1670 "more than 20,000 copies had been sold." There have been many editions, the most careful being that of Grosart in his collected edition of Herbert (1874). He also wrote "A Priest to the Temple, or the Country Parson," in prose (1652), etc.

Herbert, John Rogers. Born at Maldon, Essex, England, Jan. 23, 1810; died at London, March 17, 1890. An English historical and portrait painter. He was elected one of the masters of the government school of design at Somerset House in 1841, and royal academician in 1846. He decorated the peers' robing-room in the House of Lords. His picture "Sir Thomas More and his Daughter" is in the Vernon collection, National Gallery.

Herbert, Sidney, first Lord Herbert of Lea. Born at Richmond, Surrey, Sept. 16, 1810; died at Wilton, England, Aug. 2, 1861. An English statesman, youngest son of the eleventh Earl of Pembroke. He was secretary at war 1845–46, 1852–55, and 1859–61, and colonial secretary 1855.

Herbert, Sir Thomas. Born at York, England, about 1606; died at York, March 1, 1682. An English traveler and author. He obtained a place in the suite of Sir Dudley Carleton, ambassador to the king of Persia, in 1627. After the death of Cotton in the following year, he made an extensive tour of the Persian dominions, and returned to England in 1628. He adhered to the Parliamentary cause during the civil war; was appointed to attend Charles I. during his confinement at Holdenby in 1647; and in the same year was appointed by the king as one of his grooms of the bedchamber. He wrote "A Description of the Persian Monarchy" (1634; reprinted with additions as "Some Yeares Travels into Africa and Asia the Great," 1638), and "Threnodia Carolina" (1678; reprinted with additions as "Memoirs of the last two years of the reign of that Unparalleld Prince of very blessed memory, King Charles I.," in 1702).

Herborn, a town in the province of Hesse-Nassau, Prussia, 39 miles northeast of Coblenz.

Herculaneum (her-kū-lā'nē-um). [Gr. Ἡρακλειον, city of Hercules.] An ancient city of Campania, near the coast, 6 miles southeast of Naples, directly at the foot of Mount Vesuvius. It was overwhelmed by the eruption of the year 79 A. D., being covered in this and succeeding eruptions first with mud and then with ashes and lava to a depth of from 70 to 112 feet. The ancient town was forgotten, and modern Resina grew up over its site. In 1709 an inhabitant of Resina sunk a well which reached the ancient level in the stage structure of the theater, and brought to light sculptures and marble fragments. Further search was made, solely for the marbles and works of art, and subsequently excavations were undertaken by the government, but were very ignorantly and imperfectly conducted, and the galleries pierced were in great part filled again. Under the French rule (1806–13) systematic explorations were instituted; a little was done later (1828–38), and then nothing until Victor Emmanuel caused the resumption of the work in 1869. The most important remains are the theater, basilica, prison, some interesting private dwellings, and portions of several streets and baths. In Herculaneum were found a number of carbonized manuscripts on papyrus, some of which have been deciphered, and some of the best-known statues in the Naples Museum, including the Acrippina, Sleeping Faun, Aristides, and busts of Plato and Demosthenes.

Herculano de Carvalho e Araujo (er-kō-lā'nō de kar-vāl'yō ē ä-rä-ū'zhō). Alexandre. Born at Lisbon, March 28, 1810; died Sept. 14, 1877. A Portuguese poet, historian, and novelist. His works include the poem "A voz do propheta" ("The Voice of the Prophet," 1836), "Historia de Portugal" (1846–53), "Do origem e progressos da instituição inquisitorial em Portugal" (1854–55), the novels "Eurico" (1847), "O monge de Cister" ("The Monk of Cister," 1848), etc.

Hercules (hėr'kū-lēz), Gr. Heracles (her'ä-klēz). [Gr. Ἡρακλῆς.] In Greek and Roman mythology, a mighty hero, originating in Greek legend, later adopted by the Romans, and worshiped as the god of physical strength, courage, and related qualities. According to the mythical account, his father, Zeus (Jupiter), destined him to the sovereignty of Tiryns by right of his mother, Alcmene, granddaughter of Perseus, but was thwarted by Hera (Juno). After Hercules had performed wonderful deeds in behalf of Thebes, his birthplace, Hera consented to his being made immortal, on condition of his accomplishing certain superhuman feats for his rival Eurystheus of Tiryns, in which he succeeded. These feats, called the "twelve labors" of Hercules, were as follows: (a) the strangling of the Nemean lion; (b) the killing of the Lernean hydra; (c) the capture of the Cerynician stag; (d) the capture of the Erymanthian boar; (e) the cleaning of the Augean stables; (f) the slaughter of the Stymphalian birds; (g) the capture of the Cretan bull; (h) the capture of the man-eating mares of Diomedes; (i) the securing of the girdle of Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons; (j) the fetching of the red oxen of Geryon; (k) the procuring of the golden apples of the Hesperides; (l) the bringing to the upper world of the dog Cerberus, guardian of Hades. The subject of this most famous of the Herculean legends (of comparatively late date) is distinguished as the Tirynthian Hercules from other personifications of Hercules worshiped in different places and countries (as the Cretan or the Egyptian Hercules, etc.), under the same or other names, the attributes of these various personifications being essentially the same, but their legendary history being different. Hercules is represented as brawny and muscular, with broad shoulders, generally naked, or draped merely in the skin of the Nemean lion, the head of the lion being often drawn over that of the hero as a helmet. He is usually armed with a club, sometimes with a bow and arrows.

It has long been recognised that Heraklēs was the borrowed Phœnician Sun-god; we now know that his primitive prototype had been adopted by the Phœnicians from the Accadians of Babylonia. It is scarcely too much to say that just as in the Greek myth of Aphrodite and Adonis we find the outlines of the old Chaldean story of Istar and Tammuz, so in the legends of Heraklēs we find even the details of the legends of Gisdhubar. The lion-destroyed city Gisdhubar is the lion of Nemea; the winged bull made by Anu to avenge the slight offered to Istar is the winged bull of Krete; the tyrant Khumbaba, slain by Gisdhubar in the land of pine-trees, the seat of the gods, the sanctuary of the spirits, "is the tyrant Geryon; the gems borne by the trees of the forest beyond the river of Hades" are the golden apples of the Hesperides; and the deadly sickness of Gisdhubar himself is but the fever sent by the poisoned tunic of Nessos through the veins of the Greek hero.

Sayce, Assyria, p. 111.

Hercules. One of the ancient constellations, between Lyra and Corona Borealis, representing a man upon one knee, with his head toward the south, and with uplifted arms. The ancients did not identify the constellation with Hercules; the modern place a club in one hand and a branch of apples with the three heads of Cerberus, in the other. The constellation contains 1 star of the second magnitude, 9 of the third, and 10 of the fourth.

Hercules. A British armored war-ship, launched in 1867. Her dimensions are—length, 325 feet; breadth, 59 feet; displacement, 8,540 tons. She has a water-line belt of armor from 5 feet above to 5 feet below the water-line, a single-decked central citadel, and armored bulkheads at each end. Thickness of armor, 6, 8, and 9 inches. Armament, 8 10-inch, 2 9-inch, and 4 7-inch guns.

Hercules, Pillars of. See Pillars of Hercules.

Hercules and Stag. A notable antique bronze from Pompeii, in the Museum of Naples. Height, 6 feet. The figure of Hercules is slender and youthful; he seizes the stag by one horn, and forces him to the ground.

Hercules Buffoon. See Lucy, John.

Hercules (Infant) Strangling the Serpents. A painting by Sir Joshua Reynolds (1788), in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. The child is in the act of throttling the two serpents; Iphicles shrinks back, and Alcmena with attendants rushes in; while Juno appears in the clouds above. It was ordered by Catharine II., and symbolizes Russia's struggles, as a new nation, with besetting troubles.

Herculis (hėr'kū-lis) Insula. The ancient name of Asinara.

Hercynian Forest (hėr-sin'i-an for'est). The. [L. Hercynia Silva, Gr. Ἑρκυνία σύλη.] In ancient geography, a mountain-range in the north of Europe. It has been variously represented as in central Germany, and as identical with the Bohmerwald, the Thüringerwald, etc. In modern geography it comprises the mountains of central Germany and the northern part of the Austrian empire, from Moravia and the Carpathians to Westphalia.

Herdecke (her'de-ke). A town in the province of Westphalia, Prussia, on the Ruhr northeast of Elberfeld-Barmen.

Herder (her'der), Johann Gottfried von. Born at Mohrungen, in East Prussia, Aug. 25, 1744; died at Weimar, Dec. 18, 1803. A German critic and poet of the so-called classical period of German literature. He was the son of a poor schoolmaster of Mohrungen; was nevertheless able to attend the University of Konigsberg, where he supported himself by giving private instruction. From 1764 to 1769 he was a teacher in Riga. In the latter year he visited Paris, where he held the position of companion to the young Prince of Holstein on a journey to Italy. He accompanied the latter, however, only as far as Strasburg, where he remained for some months. In 1771 he received a call as pastor to Bückeburg, where he lived until 1776. At the recommendation of Goethe, whom he had known at Strasburg, he was called to Weimar as court chaplain and superintendent of the church district, and here, with the exception of a journey to Italy in 1788–89, he lived until his death. He was ennobled by the Elector of Baden. His first important works, both of which were published in Riga, were "Fragmente über die neuere deutsche Literatur" ("Fragments concerning the More Recent German Literature," 1767), and "Kritische Wälder" ("Critical Forests," 1769). In 1772 appeared, further, the treatise "Über den Ursprung der Sprache" ("On the Origin of Language"). In 1778 he published, in collaboration with Goethe, "Von deutscher Art und Kunst einige fliegende Blätter" ("A Few Flying Sheets on German Style and Art"). In 1774 appeared "Die älteste Urkunde des Menschengeschlechts" ("The Oldest Record of the Human Race"). The most important of his works written in Weimar are "Volkslieder" ("Folk-Songs," 1778 and 1779), called in later editions "Stimmen der Völker in Liedern" ("Voices of the Nations in Songs"); "Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte der Menschheit" ("Ideas on the Philosophy of the History of Mankind," 1784–91); "Briefe zur Beförderung der Humanität" ("Letters for the Advancement of Humanity," 1793–97). The poem "Der Cid" ("The Cid"), written 1802–03, appeared posthumously in 1805. A complete edition of his works was published at Stuttgart, 1827–30, in 60 vols.

Héreau (ā-rō'), Jules. Born at Paris, 1830; died June 26, 1879. A French landscape-painter, noted especially for his figures of animals.

Heredia (ā-rā-dē'ä), José Maria. Born at Santiago de Cuba, Dec. 31, 1803; died at Toluca, Mexico, May 7, 1839. A Spanish-American poet. He lived successively in various parts of Spanish America; was banished from Cuba in 1823 for taking part in an attempted insurrection; passed two years in the United States; and from 1825 resided in Mexico, where he held various judicial offices. His poems have had numerous editions, and many have been translated into other languages; his "Ode to Niagara" is widely known. Many critics consider Heredia the greatest of the Spanish-American poets.

Heredia, Pedro de. Born at Madrid about 1500; died near Cadiz, Jan. 27, 1554. A Spanish soldier. He was the lieutenant of Vadillo, and governor of Santa Marta. He returned to Spain in 1529, and was authorized to colonize and govern the district of Nueva Andalucia, corresponding to northwestern Colombia. He founded Cartagena (Jan. 14, 1533) and other cities, made many expeditions to the interior, and obtained a great amount of gold. In 1537 he was accused of irregularities and sent to Spain. He was acquitted in 1539. He was again forced to go to Spain to answer charges in 1548–49, and 1551; on the latter voyage he was shipwrecked and drowned.

Hereford (her'e-fėrd). [ME. Herford, Hereford, Herforth, AS. Herford, army-ford, from here, army, and ford, ford.] In the county of south midland England. It is bounded by Shropshire on the north, Worcester and Gloucester on the east, Gloucester and Monmouth on the south, and Wales on the west. The chief industry is agriculture. It is noted for its breed of cattle, and is sometimes called "the garden of England." Area, 840 square miles. Population (1891), 115,949.

2. The capital of Herefordshire, situated on the Wye in lat. 52° 4′ N., long. 2° 45′ W. It has a trade in agricultural products. The cathedral is a highly interesting monument, founded 1079, but in large part built in the course of the 13th century. The Lady chapel is a beautiful example of Early English, and the great square central tower is of Decorated style. Most of the nave and choir retains its massive cylindrical Norman piers and round arches with chevron-molding. The work above is later. The west front is very fine, consisting of especial beauty. There are many fine tombs and beautiful old church furniture. The city had formerly a strong castle. It was the birthplace of Garrick. Population (1891), 20,267.

Herencia (ā-rān'thē-ä). A town in the province of Ciudad Real, Spain, 77 miles south of Madrid. Population (1887), 5,924.

Herencia Ceballos (ā-rān'thē-ä thä-bäl'yōs), Mariano. Born at Cuzco, 1820; died at Tunacari, Feb. 2, 1873. A Peruvian soldier and politician. He was an advanced liberal, took part in various revolts, and was prominent in Congress. He was elected vice-president in the Balta administration, and was acting president after Balta's death, July 15 to Aug. 2, 1872. Soon after he was condemned to banishment, and was shot by the soldiers who were conducting him to the frontier.

Hérens (ā-rōn'), Val d', or Eringerthal (ā'ring-er-tāl). An alpine valley in the canton of Valais, Switzerland. It is bounded on the north by that of Martigny, noted for its picturesque scenery.

Here (hēr) Prophecy, The. A bit of old English rime, which was preserved by Abbot Benedict. It is connected with the image of a hart set up in 1289 by Ralph Fitzstephen over his house at Here.

The date of the setting up the hart was that of the death of Henry II. and the accession of Richard I., and the probable sense of the lines is: "When thou seest a hart reared up in Here, then shall the English people be divided into three parts: one shall go all too late into Ireland." There John, who was Lord, removed, at his brother Richard's accession to the English crown, the fighting John de Courcy from direction of affairs, and made him an enemy; while Richard, absent on crusade, exciting the hopes of the Irish chiefs, caused them to patch up their own quarrels and agree on a combined rising, of which the most notable result was a temporary loss of the English army at Thurles. The results would have been serious to England if the insurgents had not again fallen out among themselves. The "three parts" proceeds: "and the third into Apulia, with profitable remaining." On his way to the Holy Land, Richard remained at Messina, where, in a quarrel about his sister's dowry, he extorted from Tancred, the last of the Norman kings of Sicily, forty thousand ounces of gold, and betrothed his nephew Arthur of Bretagne to Tancred's daughter. Then of the third division the prophecy adds—"That third will bring their hart (?) to all drawn to vengeance." That is to say, by their oath as crusaders to avenge the desecration of the Holy Sepulchre the infidel. The last line seems to be lost by the interruption. This is my own guess at the much-evil riddle of the last part of the Here Prophecy, and, if not in every word right, it seems to give the true general sense.

Morley, English Writers, III. 201.

Herero (he-rā'rō), or Ovaherero (ō-vä-he-rā'rō). A Bantu tribe and language of German Southwest Africa, in what is called Damaraland or Hereroland. They called themselves Ovaherero, and their language Otsiherero. By some they are called Cattle-Damaras, in distinction from the Hill-Damaras. The whole life of the Herero is engrossed by his herds of cattle, which he will ruin worships, and he wars with the Namo-Hottentots, whose chief business is periodically to raid Herero cattle. The Ovaherero have been partly christianized by German missionaries, who have created a considerable literature in Otsiherero. This language belongs to the same cluster as that of the Ovambo and Ovimbundu.

Hereroland (he-rā'rō-land). See Herero.

Hereward (her'e-ward). Flourished about 1070. A noted English outlaw and patriot who defended Ely against the Normans. He was a Lincolnshire man, incorrectly said to have been a son of Leofric, earl of Mercia. In 1070 he joined the Danes, who had appeared in the Humber, and attacked Peterborough and sacked the abbey. He took refuge with his band in the Isle of Ely, from which he was finally driven by William the Conqueror. According to John of Peterborough, he was surnamed "the Wake." Many legends sprang up about his name.

Hereward. A historical novel by Charles Kingsley, published in 1866; scene laid about 1070.

Hermandad (er-män-dädh'). [Sp., 'a brotherhood.'] In Spain, originally, a voluntary organization; a Santa Hermandad, or Holy Brotherhood) for the maintenance of public order. The first Hermandad was formed in Aragon in the 13th century, and another in Castile and Leon a few years later, chiefly to resist the exactions and robberies of the nobles. They soon assumed general police and judicial powers under royal sanction; and at the end of the 15th century the organizations were united and extended over the whole kingdom. The Hermandad was soon after reorganized as a regular national police, which has been superseded in later times by a civic guard on the model of the French gendarmerie.

His best-known work is "Lehrbuch der griechischen Antiquitaten" ("Manual of Greek Antiquities," 1841–52).

Hermanns Denkmal (her'mäns denk'mäl). A monument of the chieftain Arminius at Grotenburg, Germany, dedicated in 1875. The arcaded pedestal is 100 feet high, and the colossal statue measures 86 feet to the point of the uplifted sword. The figure is of sheet-copper secured to a framework of iron.

Hermannstadt (her'män-stät). [Hung. Nagy Szeben, Rumanian Sibiu, L. Cibinium.] The capital of the country of Hermannstadt, Transylvania, situated on the Cibin in lat. 45° 48′ N., long. 24° 8′ E. It was formerly an important trading center. The majority of the inhabitants are Germans. The Bruckenthal Palace (with collections) and the Rathaus are noted buildings. It was founded by German colonists in the 12th century; was formerly capital of Transylvania; and was the scene of several contests between Hungarians, Austrians, and Russians in 1849. Population (1880), 21,465.

Hermann und Dorothea (her'män ünt dor-ō-tā'a). An idyllic poem by Goethe, published in 1797. The scene is laid about the year 1796, and has a basis of fact. It is closely connected with the expulsion of several hundred Protestants from his territory by the Archbishop of Salzburg, which occurred in 1731. Hermann is an established citizen of a little town, and represents a settled life as contrasted with the wandering and unsettled one of the fugitive but self-reliant Dorothea exiled from her home, whom he finally wins and marries.

Hermanric (her'man-rik), or Ermanaric (G. Hermerich). Died 376. King of the East Goths. He was descended from the royal family of the Amali, and ruled over a loosely welded Gothic confederacy extending probably over northern Hungary, Lithuania, and southern Russia. He was defeated by the Huns at the beginning of the migration of the peoples in northern Europe, and fell upon his sword in 376, having, it is said, attained an age of over one hundred years.

Hermaphroditus (hėr-maf-rō-dī'tus). [Gr. Ἑρμαφρόδιτος.] In Greek mythology, the son of Hermes and Aphrodite. With the nymph of the fountain Salmacis, in Caria, he was united into one person.

Hermas, Shepherd of. See Shepherd of Hermas.

Hermenegild (her'me-ne-gild), Saint. Died at Tarraco, April 13, 585. A West-Gothic prince. He was the son of Leovigild, king in Spain, by whom he was admitted to a share in the government in 573. He joined the Roman Catholic Church, and rebelled against his father, who caused his death by his father, and was canonized by Pope Sixtus V.

Hermengyld (hėr'men-gild). The wife of the Constable in Chaucer's "Man of Law's Tale," of whose murder Constance (Custance) was falsely accused.

Hermes (hėr'mēz). [Gr. Ἑρμῆς.] In Greek mythology, the herald and messenger of the gods, protector of herdsmen, god of science, commerce, invention, and the arts of life, and patron of travelers and rogues: son of Zeus (Jupiter) and Maia, born on Mount Cyllene in Arcadia. He was the guide (psychopompus) of the shade of the dead to Hades. In art he is represented as a vigorous youth, beardless after the archaic period, and usually but slightly draped, with caduceus, petasus, and talaria as attributes. The Roman Mercury, a god of much more limited and solid character, became identified with Hermes. The name has also been given to quicksilver.

Hermes, or a Philosophical Inquiry concerning Universal Grammar. A work by James Harris, published in 1751.

Hermes (her'mes), Georg. Born at Dreierwalde, Westphalia, Prussia, April 22, 1775; died at Bonn, Prussia, May 26, 1831. A German Roman Catholic theologian, founder of the system of Hermesianism, a rationalizing theory of the relation of reason to faith. He wrote "Einleitung in die christkatholische Theologie" (1819–29), "Christkatholische Dogmatik" (1834–36).

Hermesianax (hėr-me-si'a-naks). Born at Colophon, Asia Minor: lived in the last part of the 4th century B. C. A Greek elegiac poet. Fragments of his works have been edited by Hermann, Bergk, etc.

Hermes of Andros. A statue so named, in the National Museum, Athens. It is, in fact, a sepulchral statue of the 4th century B. C., the finest existing example of idealized portrait figures of this class.

Hermes carrying the Infant Bacchus. An original statue by Praxiteles, in the museum at Olympia, Greece. The left arm, with the child, rests on a tree-stump, over which is thrown the himation. The right arm was raised, and held some object to amuse the child. It is the finest rendering of a beautiful youthful figure surviving from antiquity.

Hermes (Mercury) in repose. A beautiful Greek original bronze of the school of Lysippus, in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The figure leans slightly forward; the expression is one of rest and amiability.

Hermes Trismegistus (tris-me-jis'tus). [Lit. 'Hermes the thrice greatest.'] The Greek name of the Egyptian god Thoth, the reputed author of 42 encyclopedic works on Egypt. A partial collection of Hermetic writings was translated into French by Ménard in 1866.

Hermia (hėr'mi-ä). In Shakspere's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," an Athenian lady, the daughter of Egeus: she is in love with Lysander.

Hermione (hėr-mī'ō-nē). [Gr. Ἑρμιόνη.] 1. In Greek mythology, the daughter of Menelaus and Helen, and wife of Neoptolemus, and later of Orestes.—2. The wife of the jealous Leontes in Shakspere's "Winter's Tale." She is the Bellaria of Greene's "Pandosto," the story from which the "Winter's Tale" was taken.

3. A character in Racine's "Andromaque," said to be "the most personally interesting on the French tragic stage."—4. The wife of Damon in the tragedy "Damon and Pythias" by Banim and Sheil.

Hermione, Lady (Lady Erminia Pauletti). A rich Genoese lady in Sir Walter Scott's novel "The Fortunes of Nigel."

Hermiones (hėr-mi-ō'nēz), Herminones (hėr-mi-nō'nēz), or Irminones (ėr-mi-nō'nēz). [L. (Tacitus) Herminones, the Latinization of a hypothetical Germanic fundamental form Ermenez, a name of the god Tiwaz,-Tiu, AS. Tiw (in Tuesdæg), N. Tÿr, OHG. Ziu, L. Jupiter, Gr. Ζεύς. Cf. AS. Twesdæg.] According to Tacitus, one of the three great divisions of the West-Germanic people, named from their ancestors, the three sons of Mannus, Ingvæones, Herminones, and Istvæones. The Herminones comprehended, particularly, the Upper German tribes. The Ingvæones lived in the sea-coast, included the Lower German tribes. The Istvæones were the tribes of the Rhine region who ultimately formed a principal part of the Franks. The terms are, however, of inexact ethnologic application. Pliny makes a fivefold division in that he gives, besides the three groups of Tacitus, the Vindili and the Peucini Bastarnæ. The names are probably in their first use not ethnologic, but were originally applied to Amphictyonic unions all devoted to the cult, under different attributes, of the old Germanic heaven-god.

Hermitage, The. 1. A palace in St. Petersburg, Russia, founded by Catharine II., originally in the form of a pavilion of moderate size, but rebuilt in the 19th century, especially for a museum, in a neo-Greek style of excellent effect, and forming one of the best-designed museums existing. It measures 375 by 512 feet, and has 3 interior courts. The entrance is supported by 30 colossal human figures, and the roof of the grand hall rests on 16 fine monolithic columns. On one side of the building is a copy of Raphael's Loggie in the Vatican, which survives from the old palace. The collections include important ancient sculpture, the unparalleled discoveries of Greek jewelry, textile fabrics, and other minor antiquities, from the Crimea, and one of the great galleries of paintings of Europe.

2. A fashionable resort at Moscow, Russia. It is a garden on the side of a hill.—3. A chalet built in the valley of Montmorency, France, by Madame d'Épinay as a retreat for Jean Jacques Rousseau. He passed about 6 years here (1751–57), writing then a part of "La nouvelle Héloïse," the "Discours sur l'inégalité des conditions," and a part of his "Dictionary of Music." Grimley died here in 1813.

4. An old house near Nashville, Tennessee, the residence of President Andrew Jackson.

Hermite, Tristan l'. See Tristan.

Hermocrates (hėr-mok'ra-tēz). [Gr. Ἑρμοκράτης.] Died at Syracuse about 407 B. C. A Syracusan general and politician. He was one of the three generals who in 414 were intrusted with the defense of Syracuse against the Athenians, and who after several spirited but unsuccessful engagements were deprived of their commands. He was one of the commanders of the Syracusan squadron in the naval battle of Cynossema in 412. He was banished in 409, and was killed in an attempt to make himself master of Syracuse.

Hermodorus (hėr-mō-dō'rus) of Ephesus. A Greek philosopher who is said to have assisted the decemvirs in drawing up the laws of the Twelve Tables at Rome in 451 B. C.

Hermogenes (hėr-moj'e-nēz). [Gr. Ἑρμογένης.] Born at Tarsus, Cilicia: lived in the second half of the 2d century. A noted Greek rhetorician. His rhetorical treatises were edited (in the "Rhetores Græci") by Walz.

The greatest technologist of the period now under consideration was Hermogenes, the son of Calippus of Tarsus. The year of his birth is not known, but he was only fifteen when the fame of his precocious genius as an extempore speaker led the emperor M. Aurelius to send for him; and he introduced himself by saying, "Behold, I am come to you, O prince, an orator requiring a pedagogue, an author still looking forward to maturity." So much after this he became a public teacher of rhetoric.

Hermon (hĕr'mon). [Gr. Ἑρμών.] A mountain-ridge and the culminating point in the range of Anti-Libanus, Syria, situated about 35 miles west-southwest of Damascus: the modern Jebel-esh-Sheikh. Height, 9,200 feet.

Hermonthis (hĕr-mon'this). [Gr. Ἑρμωνθίς.] In ancient geography, a town in the Thebaid, Egypt, situated on the Nile 8 miles southwest of Thebes: the modern Erment. It was a seat of ancient worship, and important ruins remain, notably those of a temple built in the time of Cleopatra.

Hermopolis. See Hermupolis.

Hermopolis (hĕr-mop'ō-lis), or Hermupolis (hĕr-mup'ō-lis), Magna. [Gr. Ἑρμοῦ πόλις μεγάλη, great city of Hermes.] In ancient geography, a city of Egypt, situated near the Nile in lat. 27° 42′ N.: the modern Eshmun or Ashmunein. Near it are the tombs and grottoes of Beni-Hassan (which see).

Hermosillo (hĕr-mō-sēl'yō). A city, capital of the state of Sonora, Mexico, situated on the river Sonora about lat. 29° 10′ N., long. 110° 45′ W. Population (1892), 7,071.

Hermsdorf (herms'dorf), Nieder-. A village and tourists' resort in the province of Silesia, Prussia, 42 miles southwest of Breslau. Population (1890), commune, 7,614.

Hermunduri (her-mun'dū-ri or her-mun-dū'ri). [L. (Pliny) Hermunduri, (Gr. (Strabo) Ἑρμίνδουροι.] A German tribe, a branch of the Suevi, first mentioned by Strabo. They were situated on the Saale eastward to the middle Elbe, and adjoined the Chatti on the west, in the Harz region. They are mentioned under their old name for the last time in the 4th century. They in all probability became, finally, the Thuringians.

Hermupolis (hĕr-mup'ō-lis), or Hermopolis (hĕr-mop'ō-lis), or Syra (sē'rä). [Gr. Ἑρμοῦ πόλις, city of Hermes.] A seaport and the capital of the nomarchy of the Cyclades, Greece, situated on the island of Syra, lat. 37° 26′ N., long. 24° 57′ E. Population (1889), 25,104.

Hermus (hĕr'mus). [Gr. Ἕρμος.] In ancient geography, a river in western Asia Minor, flowing into the Gulf of Smyrna 10 miles northwest of Smyrna: the modern Ghedis-Tchai or Sarabat. Length, about 180 miles.

Hernals (hĕr'nals). A western suburb of Vienna.

Hernandez (ār-nän'däth), Francisco. Born at Toledo, 1514: died about 1578. A Spanish naturalist, sent by Philip II. to Mexico with the cosmographer Francisco Dominguez, to study the natural history of the country. He traveled there from 1570 to 1576, and prepared 16 folio volumes on plants, animals, and minerals; portions of these were published in 1648, 1651, and 1791.

Hernani, ou l'Honneur Castillan. A tragedy by Victor Hugo, acted, after much opposition, Feb. 25, 1830. See Ernani.

The main subject of "Hernani" is the point of honour which compels a noble Spaniard to kill himself, in obedience to the blast of a horn sounded by his mortal enemy, at the very moment of his marriage with his beloved.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 520.

Herndon (hĕrn'don), William Henry. Born at Greensburg, Ky., Dec. 28, 1818: died near Springfield, Ill., March 18, 1891. An American lawyer. He removed with his parents to Illinois in 1820, and in 1843 entered into law partnership with Abraham Lincoln, which continued in force until the death of the latter. He wrote a "Life of Abraham Lincoln" (1889).

Herndon, William Lewis. Born at Fredericksburg, Va., Oct. 25, 1813: died Sept. 12, 1857. An American naval officer. In 1851–52, being then a lieutenant, he was sent with Lieutenant Lardner Gibbon to make an exploration of the river Amazon and its Peruvian tributaries. The results were published by the United States government as "Exploration of the Valley of the Amazon (1853–54)," vols. I. and II. by Herndon, Vol. II. by Gibbon). Herndon was promoted commander in 1855; took service with the Panama Mail Steamship Company; and perished in the wreck of the Central America, which went down in a cyclone.

Herne the Hunter. A traditionary personage supposed to range near an old oak, known as Herne's Oak, in Windsor Park. It was blown down in 1863, and was supposed to be about 650 years old. The queen has planted a young oak on the spot.

Hernici (hĕr'ni-sī). In ancient history, an Italian people, allied to the Sabines, dwelling in the Apennines about 40 miles southeast of Rome. Their capital was Anagnia. They were subjugated by Rome 306 B. C.

Hero (hē'rō). [Gr. Ἥρω.] In Greek legend, a priestess of Aphrodite at Sestos, on the Hellespont, beloved by Leander. See Hero and Leander.

Hero. The daughter of Leonato, and friend and cousin of Beatrice, in Shakspere's "Much Ado about Nothing." The real story of the play, the slandering of Hero, is generally left out in the stage version.

Hero and Leander. 1. A poem in 340 verses, ascribed to Musæus. "For grace of diction, metrical elegance, and simple pathos, which avoids all violations of good taste, this little canto stands far before the other poems of the same age. We know nothing of the history of this Musæus, the imitator of the 4th century, except that he was later than the poet of Panopolis. He is indirectly referred to by Agathias, who flourished in the first half of the sixth century." K. O. Müller.

The poem of "Hero and Leander" belongs rather to certain than to high poetry. The subject is the well-known story of Hero, the beautiful priestess of Venus at Sestos, and Leander, who was the glory of Abydos on the other side of the water, and who swam across the Hellespont every even-ing to visit her bride, till at last he was drowned on a winter's night, and his body cast up at the foot of Hero's tower, who, in despair, cast herself down from the battlements, and died by the side of her lover. This tragedy of Hero and Leander, the Juliet and Romeo of the Dardanelles, was of much older date than Musæus. It was well known to Ovid, Virgil, and Propertius, and Virgil's version is lamentable. But Musæus is the author of the most complete version of the story, and he has told it in a manner which will bear criticism. There is no pause in the brief narrative from the beginning, where the lovers meet, like the hero and heroine of Heliodorus and Shakspere, on a festive occasion, down to the fatal issue of Hero's passion. The poet does not, like the other erotic writers, delight in his opportunity of describing details. There is nothing to shock the most delicate reader, and the grace of the language and the metrical power, in spite of a certain affectation which would have done credit to a better age. The "Hero and Leander" of Musæus is the dying swan-note of Greek poetry, the last distinct echo of the old music of Hellas.

2. A poem of Marlowe and Chapman, based on the poem of Musæus. The first edition consisted of Marlowe's portion, 2 sestiads; the second edition gave the whole poem, the remaining 4 sestiads being written by Chapman after Marlowe's death. Both editions appeared in 1598.

Herod (her'od) I., surnamed "The Great." [Gr. Ἡρῴδης.] King of Judea 40–4 B. C. He came of an Idumean family which was converted to Judaism. His father, Antipater, succeeded during the conflict between Hyrcanus II. and Aristobulus II. in securing the confidence and hold in Judean politics and befriending the Romans. Accordingly when Antipater was appointed by Cæsar in 47 B. C. procurator of Judea, Herod, though only 15 years old, was made governor of Galilee, and shortly afterward of Cœle-Syria. In 40 he had to flee from Judea to Rome, and was appointed by the senate king of Judea. In 37 he took possession of his kingdom with the aid of the Romans. During the civil war he was on the side of Mark Antony, but after the battle of Actium (31 B. C.) he secured the favor of the victorious Octavianus. He only confirmed him in his kingdom, but also considerably increased his territory, so that it extended from the sea to Syria, and from Damascus to Egypt. His policy toward Rome was that of outspoken servility, though his secret aim may have been the founding of an independent monarchy. His attitude toward the people over whom he ruled was characterized by entire want of sympathy with their religious and political culture, ideals, and aspirations. His rule was marked by unscrupulous selfishness and bloody despotism. In his family relations he showed the same passionate, jealous disposition. At the same time, he was bold, prudent, understanding his opportunities and knowing how to avail himself of them, liberal, and fond of pomp and display. To these qualities may be ascribed his success, and what popularity he obtained. Thus, to strengthen his position he had his benefactor Hyrcanus II. executed, and it was assumed that his brother-in-law Aristobulus appointed by him high priest, was drowned at his instigation for fear of his great popularity with the people. The people he held in subjection by bloody terror. He built the magnificent temple begun 20 B. C. and finished in 9 years (Josephus, Antiq., XV. 11) could not gain him the hearts of the outraged people. At the same time with the temple, he erected everywhere theatres, gymnasia, and northern temples. Even some cities owe their origin to his love of building, notably Cæsarea, Samaria was turned by him into a fortress, and Jericho into a city. In a fit of jealousy he executed his beautiful wife Marianne, granddaughter of Hyrcanus II., and later his two sons by her, Alexander and Aristobulus, and five days before his death his eldest son by Doris, Antipater. His last order, according to a well-known story, was for the massacre of the nobles more hatefully after his decease, so that at least his death might cause mourning (Josephus, Antiq., XVII. c. 5). He died in great agony from a loathsome disease, which drove him to a suicidal attempt, 4 B. C. In Mat. ii. 1 ff. he is represented as having ordered the massacre of the infants of Bethlehem, in order to exterminate the child Jesus, an act which would have been quite in harmony with his character as a superstitious despot and tyrant, but the historicity of which causes chronological difficulties.

Herod Agrippa. See Agrippa.

Herod Antipas (her'od an'ti-pas). Son of Herod the Great, appointed by his father successor to the throne, but invested by the Romans with only the tetrarchy of Galilee. He first married the daughter of Aretas, king of the Nabatæans; but abandoned her to marry Herodias, the wife of his half-brother Herod Philip, and was thus involved in a war with Aretas. At the instigation of Herodias he had John the Baptist who reproached him for his unauthorizing unprincipled and afterward executed. Jesus called him "the fox." When his nephew Agrippa I. was made king of Judea by Caligula, Antipas, urged by his wife, repaired to Rome also to obtain a kingdom. Agrippa accused him of treachery to Rome, and Antipas was deprived of his principality and banished to Lyons. He was followed thither by his wife, and both died in exile.

Herodes, Atticus. See Atticus Herodes.

Herodians (he-rō'di-ąnz). A party among the Jews in the time of Christ and the apostles, adherents of the family of Herod. The Herodians constituted a political party rather than a religious sect. Some writers suppose that they were the most partisan dupes in religion.

Herodianus (he-rō-di-ā'nus), or Herodian (he-rō'di-ąn). [Gr. Ἡρωδιανός.] Born about 170 (?) A. D.: died about 240 (?) A. D. A Greek historian, resident in Italy, author of a Roman history for the period 180–238 A. D. (Commodus to Gordian).

Herodianus, Ælius. Born at Alexandria: lived at the end of the 2d century. A Greek grammarian, author of a work on prosody.

Herodias (he-rō'di-as). Lived in the first half of the 1st century. The sister of Herod Agrippa I., wife of Herod Philip, and afterward second wife of Herod Antipas, half-brother of Herod Philip. See Herod Antipas.

Herodotus (he-rod'ō-tus). [Gr. Ἡρόδοτος.] Born at Halicarnassus, Asia Minor, probably about 484 B. C.: died at Thurii, Italy, probably about 424 B. C. A celebrated Greek historian, surnamed "the Father of History." According to the commonly accepted account of his life, gleaned chiefly from his own works, he was the son of Lyxes and Dryo, persons of means and station at Halicarnassus; assisted in the expulsion of the tyrant Lygdamus from his native city; travelled in the Persian empire, Egypt, Asia Minor, and Greece; lived in Samos, and later in Athens; and settled as a resident in Thurii (probably in 444). He wrote a history in 9 books (named after the nine Muses) of the wars between Greece and Persia, 479–478 B. C. It was first printed in the original by Aldus Manutius in 1502, a Latin version by Valla having appeared as early as 1474.

About fifteen manuscripts of the history of Herodotus are known to critics; and of these, several are not of higher antiquity than the middle of the fifteenth century. One copy, in the French king's library (there are in that collection five or six), appears to belong to the twelfth century; there is one in the Vatican, and one in the Florentine library, attributed to the tenth century; one in the library of Emanuel College, Cambridge, formerly the property of Archbishop Usher, is believed to be very ancient; the libraries of Oxford and of Vienna contain also manuscripts of this author.

Herod Philip (her'od fil'ip). Died about 34 A. D. Son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra, made tetrarch of Auranitis and the neighboring regions in 4 B. C. His wife Herodias deserted him for his half-brother, Herod Antipas.

Hérold (ā-rold'), Louis Joseph Ferdinand. Born at Paris, Jan. 28, 1791: died at Paris, Jan. 19, 1833. A noted French composer of comic operas. He took the grand prix de Rome for his cantata "Mlle de la Vallière" (1812). His works are: "La Gioventù di Lucullo" (Naples, 1815), "Charles de France" (with Boieldieu; 1816), "Les rosières" (1817), "Le premier venu" (1818), "Les troqueurs" (1819), "L'Amour platonique" (1819), "Lasthénie" (1821), "Le lapin blanc" (1824), "Le dernier jour de Missolonghi" (1828), "Emilie" (1828), "Zampa" (1831), "Le marquise de Brinvilliers" (1831), "La médecine sans médecin" (1832), "Le pré aux clercs" (1832), "Ludovic (finished by Halévy; 1833), etc. He also wrote a great deal of music for the piano forte, and a number of ballets.

Heron (her'on). [Gr. Ἥρων.] An Alexandrian mathematician of the 3d century B. C., the inventor of "Hero's fountain," in which a jet of water is maintained by condensed air, and of a machine acting on the principle of Barker's mill, in which the motion is produced by steam. Fragments of his works on mechanics have been preserved.

Heron, surnamed "The Younger." A Byzantine mathematician and natural philosopher, probably of the 7th century.

Heron (her'on), Matilda. Born at Londonderry, Ireland, Dec. 1, 1830: died at New York, March 7, 1877. An actress. She made her debut at Philadelphia (?), when quite young, as Imogen in "Lear." Her principal part was Camille. In 1857 she married Robert Stoepel, a musician, and was divorced from him in 1869. Her daughter, Jabon, also an actress, was born at New York in 1866.

Heroopolites Sinus (her-ō-op-ō-li'tēz sī'nus), [Gr. Ἡρωοπολιτικὸς κόλπος, gulf of Heroopolis, from ἡ Ἡρωοπόλις, city of heroes, a city on the coast.] The ancient name of the Gulf of Suez.

Herophilus (he-rof'i-lus). [Gr. Ἡρόφιλος.] Born at Chalcedon, Bithynia; lived about 300 B. C. A Greek anatomist and physician.

Herostratus (he-ros'tra-tus). [Gr. Ἡρόστρατος.] An Ephesian who set fire to the temple of Diana (Artemis) at Ephesus (as it happened, on the night of the birth of Alexander the Great) in order to immortalize himself.

It was remarked by Hegesias the Magnesian that the conflagration was not to be wondered at, since the goddess was absent from Ephesus, and attending on the delivery of Olympias; an observation, says Plutarch, frigid enough to have put out the fire. The stroke of genius in question, however, is ascribed by Cicero, whose taste it does not seem to have shocked, to Timæus of Tauromenium.

Herrada, Juan de. See Roda.

Herran (är-rän'), Pedro Alcantara. Born at Bogotá, Oct. 19, 1800; died there, April 26, 1872. A Colombian general and statesman. He served in the war for independence, and in Peru in 1826. He subsequently was prominent as a liberal in the civil wars of New Granada, at times as commander-in-chief of the government forces, and was president 1841–45. General Herran was known as the "Húsar de Ayacucho," from a brilliant charge which he made in that battle.

Herrenhausen (her'ren-hou-zen). A royal palace in Hannover. George I. and George II. of England resided there.

Herrera, or Herrera y Tordesillas (är-rā'rä ē tōr-dā-sēl'yäs), Antonio de. Born at Cuellar, Segovia, 1549; died at Madrid, March 29, 1625. A Spanish historian. Philip II. made him chief chronicler of America and one of the chroniclers of Castile, offices which he held until his death. His principal work is the "Historia general de los hechos de los Castellanos en las islas y Tierra Firme del Mar Oceano" in six decades (Madrid, 1601). This includes the history of America, arranged in the form of annals from 1492 to 1554, and is the most important of the older works on the subject. Herrera also published a history of the world during the reign of Philip II., and many other works.

Herrera, Fernando de. Born at Seville, Spain, 1534; died at Seville, 1597. A celebrated Spanish lyric poet, surnamed "the Divine," a friend of Cervantes who wrote a sonnet in his honor. His poetical works were published by his friend, the painter Francisco Pacheco, in 1582 and 1619. He also wrote "Relacion de la guerra de Chipre, y suceso de la batalla naval de Lepanto" (1572), and "Vida y Muerte de Tomas Moro" (1592).

Herrera, Francisco, surnamed el Viejo ('the Old'). Born at Seville, Spain, about 1576; died at Madrid, 1656. A Spanish painter, etcher, engraver, and architect. Among his best works is a "Last Judgment," at Seville.

Herrera, Francisco, surnamed el Mozo ('the Young'). Born at Seville, Spain, 1622; died at Madrid, 1685. A Spanish painter, son of Francisco Herrera.

Herrera, José Joaquin de. Born in Jalapa, 1792; died at Tacubaya, Feb. 10, 1854. A Mexican general and statesman. An officer in the Spanish army, he followed the defection of Iturbide in 1821, but opposed him as emperor. He was several times minister of war, was president of the Supreme Court, and was temporary president of the republic in 1844. He was elected president Sept. 14, 1845, but was compelled to resign Dec. 30; was second in command under Santa Anna during the war with the United States; and was again president during a peaceful term, May 30, 1848, to Jan. 15, 1851.

Hesiod (hē'si-od). [Gr. Ἡσίοδος.] A celebrated Greek poet. He was, according to a poem attributed to him, born in the village of Ascra, in Bœotia, and probably lived about 735 B. C. He is also according to the same authority, spent in rural pursuits at his native village. He appears to have lived during the latter part of his life at Orchomenus, where he is said to have been buried. The obscurity in which his life is involved has led some critics to adopt the opinion that the name does not represent an actual person, but is a mere personification of the Bœotian or Hellenic spirit of poetry, as opposed to the Ionian or Ionic. Of the numerous works commonly ascribed to him the most important are "Works and Days" and "Theogony." The latter poem is chiefly composed of precepts on rural economy and maxims of morality; the latter is an account of the origin of the world and the birth of the gods.

Hesione (hesī-ō-nē). [Gr. Ἡσιόνη.] In Greek legend, a daughter of Laomedon, king of Troy, and Leucippe. She was exposed, as a propitiatory sacrifice to be killed by a sea-monster, by Poseidon, to devastate the land. Hercules slew the monster and set her free, and, when the promised reward was refused him, took Troy, slew Laomedon and his sons, and gave Hesione to his companion, Telamon, by whom she became the mother of Teucer.

Hesperia (hes-pē'ri-ä). [Gr. Ἑσπερία.] According to the ancient Greeks, the region of the west, especially Italy, and sometimes, according to the poets, the Iberian peninsula.

Hesperides (hes-per'i-dēz). [Gr. Ἑσπερίδες.] In Greek mythology, maidens, guardians of the golden apples which Gæa (Earth) caused to grow as a marriage-gift for Hera. They dwelt in the extreme west, or, according to one account, among the Hyperboreans. According to Hesiod they were daughters of Night: in later accounts, daughters of Atlas and Hesperis, named Ægle, Arethusa, Erytheia, and Hesperia.

Hesperus (hes'pe-rus). [Gr. Ἕσπερος.] The evening star, in Greek mythology, son of Astræus and Eos (according to Hesiod). He was regarded as identical with the morning star, and was hence called the "Light-bringer." Compare Phosphorus.

Hesperus, in Arthurian legend, the name given to Sir Pertolope, the Green Knight. Tennyson calls him the "Evening Star": his famous combat took place at dawn. See Hesperus, above.

Hesperus, Mount. See Bonded Peak.

Hesvan (hes'van), or Heshvan (hesh'van). [Heb.] The eighth month of the Jewish year, corresponding to the latter part of Oct. and a part of Nov. It has 29 or 30 days. Its tullet form is Marcheshvan, from Babylonian warkhsamnu (with assimilary phonetic change), eighth month. Like the other names of the Hebrew months, it was borrowed from the Babylonians about the time of the exile.

Hesychasts (hes'i-kasts). [Gr. ἡσυχαστής, one who leads a retired life.] A body of monks who lived on Mount Athos during the 14th century, and aimed to attain, by the practice of contemplation and asceticism, perfect serenity of mind, and hence supernatural insight and divine light, with knowledge of the Deity.

Hesychius (he-sik'i-us). [Gr. Ἡσύχιος.] Put to death at the beginning of the 4th century. An Egyptian bishop, reputed reviser of the Septuagint and the New Testament.

Hesychius. Lived in the 6th (or 4th ?) century. A Greek grammarian of Alexandria. He compiled a Greek lexicon, edited by Alberti and Kuhnken 1746–66, and by M. Schmidt 1857–68.

The most important Byzantine lexicon bears the name of Hesychius — a name which appears to have lived in the latter part of the fourth century; but has unquestionably come down to us in modified form, including many additions of a much later date. Hesychius himself was probably a pagan, and a large portion of these additions consists in Biblical glosses which must have proceeded from the pen of some Christian grammarian. The value of the work is not much enhanced by these later additions. But it is an inestimable aid to the study of the classical authors, especially Homer, because it embodies in a large measure the best traditions of the older grammarians of Alexandria. It was derived immediately by Hesychius from the dictionary, in five books, by Diogenianus, who lived at Heraclea, in the time of Hadrian; and this, again, was an extract from the great dictionary, in ninety-five books, by Pamphilus and Zopyrion, of the school of Aristarchus.

K. O. Muller, Hist. of the Lit. of Ane Greece, III. 384. [Donaldson.]

Hesychius, surnamed "The Illustrious." Born at Miletus, Asia Minor: lived at the beginning of the 6th century. A Greek historical and biographical writer.

Hetæria Philike (het-ā-rē'ä fē-lē'kē'). [NGr. ἑταιρία φίλικη.] A secret political society founded at Odessa in 1814 for the purpose of liberating Greece from the Turkish domination. In 1820 it chose as its leader Prince Alexander Hypsilanti, who in 1821 inaugurated the Greek war for independence.

Heth (heth). A descendant of Canaan (Gen. x. 15); the ancestor of the family from whom Abraham purchased the cave of Machpelah (Gen. xx.). See Hittites.

Hettner (het'ner), Hermann Julius Theodor. Born at Leisersdorf, near Goldberg, Prussia, March 12, 1821: died at Dresden, May 29, 1882. A German historian of literature and art. He became professor at Jena in 1851, and in 1855 went to Dresden as director of the royal collections of antiquities, etc. Later (1865) he became director of the Historical Museum and of the Rietschel Museum. His chief work is "Literaturgeschichte des 18. Jahrhunderts" (1856–70).

Hettstädt, or Hettstedt (het'stet). A town in the province of Saxony, Prussia, situated on the Wipper 35 miles south of Magdeburg. Population (1890), commune, 8,641.

Hessen-Nassau

Hesse-Nassau (hes'nas'ä). G. Hessen-Nassau (hes'sen-nas'sou). A province of Prussia, formed in 1868. Capital, Cassel. It comprises nearly all Hesse-Cassel, nearly all Nassau, part of Hesse-Homburg, the other cessions made in Hesse in 1866, and those made by Bavaria in 1866. It is surrounded by the Prussian provinces of Saxony, Hanover, Westphalia, and the Rhine, Hesse, Bavaria, Waldeck, and Saxe-Weimar; and there are also several small exclaves. It surrounds Upper Hesse. The surface is generally hilly, and in part mountainous. The soil is generally fertile. Agriculture and industries are flourishing. There are 2 government districts, Cassel and Wiesbaden. Area, 6,068 square miles. Population (1890), 1,864,428.

Hessian (hesh'an). The German dialect of old Hessian territory about the upper Lahn, the Fulda, and the Eider. With Upper and Middle Franconian and Thuringian, it forms the group specifically called Middle German.

Hessians (hesh'anz). The natives or inhabitants of Hesse in Germany. The Hessians as a race are the representatives of the ancient Teutonic people the Catti (Chatti); they formed various minor states in Germany, of which five have been Hesse-Cassel (annexed to Prussia in 1866) and the grand duchy of Hesse, called Hesse-Darmstadt (reverts to 1866.

Heywood, John. Born about 1500; died at Mechlin, Belgium, about 1580. A noted English epigrammatist. He was a sort of court jester, though of good social position, and amused by his powers of repartee. He was a favorite with Queen Mary, but when Elizabeth succeeded to the throne, 1558, he left England, as is supposed to have died. He wrote 3 interludes in which for the first time characters were personal and not mere abstractions, and thus paved the way for English drama. The best-known of the interludes is the "Four Pes: a merry interlude of a Palmer, a Pardoner, a Potycary, and a Pedlar," printed in the "Hundreth Merry Tales, Wittie and Proverbs" (1562) show both wit and humor, and were very popular. He wrote also "The Play of Love," "The Play of the Weather," etc.

Heywood, Thomas. Born in Lincolnshire, England; died about the middle of the 17th century. A noted English dramatist and miscellaneous writer. He speaks of his residence at Cambridge in his "Apology for Actors," but there is no record of him there. He was an actor, a member of the Lord Admiral's, Earl of Worcester's, Lord Derby's, Lord Queen Worcester's, and the Queen's companies. After the death of the queen he went back to the Earl of Worcester's company. He was a voluminous writer. Among his plays are "The Four Prentices of London, etc." (produced about 1600; printed 1615), "Edward IV." (in 2 parts), "If You Know not Me You Know Nobody" (1605–06; in 2 parts), "The Royal King and the Loyal Subject" (printed 1637; acted much earlier), "A Woman Killed with Kindness" (1603), "The Rape of Lucrece" (1608), "The Silver Exchange" (1607), "The Golden Age" (1611), "The Silver Age" (1612), "The Brazen Age" (1613), "The Iron Age" (1632; 2 parts), "The Fair Maid of the West" (acted 1617, printed 1631), "The English Traveller" (printed 1633), "Love's Mistress" (1636), "The Wise Woman of Hogsden" (1638), "Fortune by Land and Sea" (with William Rowley; printed 1655), "The Late Lancashire Witches" (with Richard Brome; 1634). He wrote the lord mayor's pageants for many years. Among his miscellaneous works are translations of Sallust (1608), Lucian (1637), Ovid, and others; "Troia Britannica," a long heroic poem (1609); "An Apology for Actors" (1612; reprinted with alterations by Collier in "Shakespeare's Library"); "The Actors Vindication"; "England's Elizabeth" (1631); "The Hierarchy of the Blessed Angels," a long didactic poem (1635).

Hezekiah (hez-ē-kī'ä). [Heb., 'God is my strength.'] King of Judah for 29 years. The date of his accession to the throne is variously given as 725, 726, and 715 B. C. He restored the service of Jehovah, purged the country of heathenry which was spread under his father Ahaz, and inaugurated a thorough reform of the theocratic spirit. He obtained a series of victories over the Philistines. Concerning his relation to Assyria, accounts differ. In the Old Testament as well as in the cuneiform inscriptions. Hezekiah undertook to shake off the Assyrian supremacy under which Judah had groaned since Uzziah. He would seem that Shabaco (Sevechus) and Sargon were somehow prevented from punishing him. But Sennacherib made two invasions into Judah. The first (702) is briefly related in 2 Ki. xviii, according to which, after Sennacherib had captured all the fortified cities in Judah, Hezekiah submitted and sent to the conqueror at Lachish 300 talents of silver and 30 talents of gold. The prism inscription of Sennacherib relates more fully that he attacked Hezekiah because he kept Padi, king of Ekron, prisoner in Jerusalem; that he took 46 fenced cities and many captives, and gave a part of his territory to the kings of Ekron, Ashdod, and Gaza; and that he besieged Jerusalem, shutting up Hezekiah in it "like a bird in a cage." Hezekiah sent to Lachish (Sennacherib) sent a letter through his chief general (tartan) and prime minister (rab-shakeh) to Hezekiah, demanding the surrender of the capital. The result of this invasion, as given in the biblical record, was that the Assyrian army of 185,000 troops besieging Jerusalem was smitten by the angel of the Lord in the night, and were "all dead corpses." The Assyrian inscriptions contain no reference to the catastrophe of the army, which is mostly explained to have been caused by a pestilence; but this omission is easily accounted for by national pride. The extraordinary event is corroborated by a tradition preserved in Egypt, and heard 2,0 years later by Herodotus. The divergences between the biblical and the Assyrian accounts concern more nearly the chronology. According to the biblical account Hezekiah reigned 727–699; for the destruction of the kingdom of Israel in 722 is represented as taking place in his 6th year, and Sennacherib's campaign, which fell in the 14th year of Hezekiah, would have to be put in 713. But Sennacherib did not come to the throne before 705, and the date of the campaign in the inscriptions (701) is therefore preferable. Again, the illness of Hezekiah, his recovery, and the congratulatory embassy from Merodach-Baladan, to whom he showed his rich treasures, are represented in the Bible as happening after the collision with Sennacherib. But this must have occurred before the treasury was emptied to pay the heavy tribute to Assyria (c. c., 711 or 710).

H. H. The pseudonym (for Helen Hunt) of Helen Maria Fiske (Mrs. Hunt; afterward Mrs. Jackson).

Hiawatha (hi-a-wä'tä or hī-a-wä'thä). A personage of miraculous birth, known by this name among the Iroquois, and by other names among other tribes of North American Indians. He was sent among them to teach them the arts of peace. "In any form the tale has been known to the whites less than 50 years, and the Onondaga version first had publicity through Mr. J. V. H. Clark, in a communication to the New York 'Commercial Advertiser.' He obtained it from two Onondaga chiefs. Schoolcraft used these notes before they were included in Clark's history, and afterward appropriated the name for his Western Indian legends, where it had no proper place. About the same time, Mr. Alfred B. Street had a few original hints from other Iroquois sources, which he used in his metrical romance of 'Frontenac,' along with some from Schoolcraft. Thus, when Longfellow's 'Hiawatha' appeared, I was surprised to greet an old friend, and was surprised at being introduced to an Ojibway instead of an Iroquois leader." (W. M. Beauchamp, Journal Amer. Folk-Lore, IV. 295.) Longfellow's poem "Hiawatha," published in 1855, was based on Schoolcraft. The latter's "Myth of Hiawatha" was published in 1856, and dedicated to Longfellow.

Hiazus. See Iazus.

Hibbert Lectures. A foundation instituted by the trustees of Robert Hibbert, a West India merchant, who died in 1849. For many years the trustees applied the funds mainly to the higher culture of students for the Unitarian ministry, but in 1878 resolved to institute Hibbert Lectures, with a view to impartable and really honest treatment of unsettled problems in theology, apart from the interest of any particular church or system. Amongst the lecturers have been Max Müller, Page Renouf, Renan, Rhys Davids, Kuenen, Beard, Réville, Pfleiderer, Rhys, Sayce, and Hatch. Chambers's Encyclopædia, V. 705.

The first is a biographical notice, in which his travels form a principal feature, composed by two of his pupils, Hoei-li and Yen-Tsong; the second (" Memoirs of the Countries of the Western World") was edited by Julien. These works, translated into French by Julien, are an invaluable source for the history of the times. Hiouen-Tsang is said to have translated from Sanskrit into Chinese 657 works.

Hipparchus (hi-pär'kus). [Gr. Ἵππαρχος.] Died at Athens, 514 B. C. A tyrant of Athens, son of Pisistratus. He reigned in conjunction with his brother Hippias from 527 to 514, when he was slain by Harmodius and Aristogiton. See Harmodius.

Hipparchus. Born at Nicæa, Bithynia; lived about 160–125 B. C. A celebrated Greek astronomer and mathematician of scientific importance. He catalogued the stars, invented the planisphere, and made a number of most important discoveries, including the eccentricity of the solar orbit, some of the inequalities of the moon's motion, the precession of the equinoxes, etc.

Hippel (hip'pel). Theodor Gottlieb von. Born at Gerdauen, East Prussia, Jan. 31, 1741: died at Königsberg, Prussia, April 23, 1796. A German humorist. His works include "Über die Ehe" ("On Marriage," 1774), "Lebensläufe nach aufsteigender Linie" ("Careers according to Ascending Line," 1778–81), etc. His collected works were published 1827–28.

Hippias (hip'i-as). [Gr. Ἱππίας.] Died about 490 B. C. A son of Pisistratus, whom he succeeded as tyrant of Athens (jointly with Hipparchus) in 527. He was sole ruler from 514, and was expelled in 510.

Hippo, or Hippo Regius (hip'ō rē'ji-us). [Gr. Ἵππων βασιλικός.] In ancient geography, a city of Numidia, near the site of the modern Bona. Augustine was bishop of Hippo. It was burned by the Vandals in 430.

Hippocrates (hi-pok'ra-tēz). [Gr. Ἱπποκράτης.] Born in the island of Cos about 460 B. C.: died at Larissa, Thessaly, about 377. A famous Greek physician, surnamed "the Father of Medicine." The 87 treatises forming the so-called "Hippocratic Collection" have been edited by Kühn 1826–27, by Ermerins 1859–65, and by Littré 1839–61 (with translation). See the extract.

> The life of Hippocrates is shrouded in a strange mist, considering the extraordinary celebrity of the man. In the late biographies which remain to us, the following facts seem worthy of record. A certain Soranus of Ephesus, whose writings are said to have made use of documents among the records of the Asclepiad guild, in which Hippocrates was set down as the seventeenth in descent from Podalirius, Asclepius, and Apollo, on the 20th of the month Agrianus, in the year 460 B. C. The inhabitants were still offering him the honours of a hero. He seems to have traveled about a good deal, particularly in the countries round the modern Bosporus, and to have died, in an advanced age, at Larissa in Thessaly, leaving two sons, Thessalus and Draken. Many of these descendants and followers in the school of Cos were called after him. Strabo enumerates seven in all — so that this additional uncertainty of authorship attaches to his alleged writings. The many statues of him agreed in representing him with his head covered, a peculiarity which excited many baseless and some absurd conjectures. Abstracting carefully from the numerous Hippocrates mentioned in contemporary Attic literature, there are two undoubted references to the great physician of Cos in Plato, and one in Aristophanes, which establish the epoch assigned to him in the biographies. He is said to have been instructed by Herodicus of Selymbria, and Gorgias of Leontini, a legend arising merely from the confusing of this Herodicus with another physician who happened to be the brother of Gorgias. There is no vestige of either Herodicus' practice or Gorgias' rhetoric in the extant treatises; but Hippocrates assuredly, like Pericles, trained himself for a large knowledge of his special pursuit by a familiarity with the metaphysics of the day. His alleged study of the great plague at Athens is not corroborated by a comparison with Thucydides's account. The works pronounced genuine by Littré, in the large collection of Hippocratic writings which still survive, are those of the treatises on "Ancient Medicine," on "Prognostic" (which includes our diagnosis in the largest sense), the "Epidemics" (I. and III. in the "Treatment of Acute Diseases," the tracts on joints, fractures, and surgical instruments applied to them, on head wounds, and the "Oath" and "Law" of the guild.

Hippocrene (hip'ō-krēn or hip-ō-krē'nē). [Gr. Ἱπποκρήνη.] A fountain on Mount Helicon, Boeotia, sacred to the Muses.

Hippodamia (hip-ō-da-mī'a), or Hippodameia (hip-ō-da-mī'a). [Gr. Ἱπποδάμεια.] In Greek legend: (a) The daughter of Œnomaüs, and wife of Pelops. (b) A daughter of Atrax, one of the Lapithæ. At her marriage with Peirithous the battle of the Centaurs and Lapithæ took place.

Hippodamus (hip-pod'a-mus) of Miletus. [Gr. Ἱππόδαμος.] A Greek sophist, architect, and engineer, who laid out the Piræus, and later constructed Thurium and Rhodes. His work was done on definite principles and according to carefully planned system which was always followed in laying out new Greek cities.

Hippolita (hi-pol'i-tạ). 1. See Hippolyte. — 2. In Shakspere's "Midsummer Night's Dream," queen of the Amazons, betrothed to Theseus. She also appears as the bride of Theseus in "The Two Noble Kinsmen." — 3. The principal female character in Wycherley's comedy "The Gentleman Dancing Master."

Hippolyte (hi-pol'i-tē). [Gr. Ἱππολύτη.] In classical mythology, a queen of the Amazons. She was the daughter of Ares and Otrera, or, according to some, the daughter of Ares and Harmonia. The girdle was considered by Eurystheus, who ordered Heracles to fetch it, Hercules was kindly received at the court and was promised the girdle; but Hera roused the Amazons by spreading the report that their queen was being robbed, and Hercules, believing that Hippolyte was plotting against his life, killed her and carried away the girdle.

Hippolyte. See Hippolita.

Hippolytus (hi-pol'i-tus). [Gr. Ἱππόλυτος.] In Greek legend, the son of Theseus and Hippolyte or Antiope, and stepson of Phædra. Phædra fell in love with him, but was repulsed, and in revenge falsely accused him to Theseus of making improper proposals to her. Theseus called upon Poseidon to avenge him, and, accordingly, as Hippolytus was driving along the shore, the god sent a bull from the sea which frightened the horses, were frightened, and he was thrown out of his chariot and dragged until he died. When Theseus discovered the innocence of his son, Phædra killed herself in despair. See Phædra.

Hippolytus. 1. A tragedy by Euripides, exhibited in 428 B. C.

> The "Hippolytus" (of Euripides) is our earliest example of a romantic subject in the Greek drama. We are told that it obtained the first prize against Sophocles's own competition, but we are not told whether or what other plays accompanied it, nor of the plays it defeated. The earlier version of the play is lost, and is said to have offended, but possibly copied in the play of Seneca: yet it failed at Athens, chiefly, it is thought, because of the boldness with which Phædra told her love in person to her stepson, and then in person maligned him to his father. — Seeks to have admitted a great deal of gallantry in the hero.
> Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 336.

2. A tragedy by Seneca, also called "Phædra," founded upon the same legend.

> The "Hippolytus" of Seneca, from which the scene of Phædra's personal declaration to Hippolytus was adopted by Racine in his famous play, is still praised by French critics. It was highly esteemed, and even preferred to the Greek play, in the Renaissance. It was acted in Latin at Rome in 1486, and freely rendered in Italian in the French version in 1573. The next celebrated French version was that of Gilbert, Queen Christina's friend, in 1646. But his very title, "Hippolyte, ou le Garçon insensible," sounds strange, and Racine was obliged in his preface to have admitted a great deal of gallantry in the hero.

Hippolytus Romanus. An ecclesiastical writer of the 3d century. He was a pupil of Irenæus; appears to have been bishop of Portus Romanus (Porto); and was the leader of a disaffected and schismatic party, orthodox in doctrine and rigoristic in discipline, during the pontificates of Zephyrinus (202–218) and Callistus (218–223). According to a late tradition he died a martyr's death in 235 or 236. He is commemorated by the Roman Catholic Church on Aug. 22. His chief work is "Philosophumena," written in Greek, a manuscript of which was discovered at Mount Athos in 1842 and published by Emmanuel Miller in 1851.

Hipponax (hi-pon'naks). [Gr. Ἱππώναξ.] Born at Ephesus: flourished during the second half of the 6th century B. C. A Greek iambic poet, generally reckoned as the third (with Archilochus and Simonides): noted as the inventor of the choliambus. He was expelled from Ephesus by the tyrants Athenagoras and Comas, and thereafter resided at Clazomenæ. He was deformed, and is said to have died of starvation.

Hiram (hī'ram), or Huram (hū'ram). [Perhaps shortened from Ahi-ram, exalted brother.] 1. King of Tyre about 1000 B. C., a contemporary of David and Solomon. He raised Tyre to a leading position in the Phenician confederacy, built many temples, and subjugated Cyprus. He entertained amicable relations with David and Solomon, assisted at the building of the temple at Jerusalem by furnishing materials and artisans, and entered with Solomon into a commercial alliance. The tomb of Hiram is shown on the hillside east of Tyre.

Hiram's reign lasted thirty-four years. He was fifty-three years old at his death, and left his crown to his son Baalmazar, or Belbazar. A remarkable monument, about three miles distant from the modern Tyre (sur), but said to have been originally built just outside the eastern gate of the continental town, which thence sloped down to the sea, is known to the present day as "the Tomb of Hiram," and may well have been the actual sepulcher of this ancient king. It is a "grey, weather-beaten" structure, bearing all the marks of a high antiquity. Upon a pedestal consisting of three courses of grey limestone, each three feet thick, and the uppermost a little overhanging the other two, is emplaced a tomb or sarcophagus formed out of a single block, which is twelve feet long by six feet high and six feet broad. The sarcophagus is covered over by a heavy lid in the shape of a solid block three feet in thickness, which appears never to have been removed. The tomb, however, has been rifled: a large hole has been broken into the eastern end of the sarcophagus, and its contents, whatever they were, have been removed.

Rawlinson, Phœnicia, p. 105.

2. A distinguished worker in brass brought by Solomon from Tyre (1 Ki. vii. 13).

Hiram. A town of Portage County, Ohio, 30 miles southeast of Cleveland, the seat of Hiram College (Church of the Disciples).

Hiranyagarbha (hi-ran-ya-gär'bha). [Skt., 'golden germ' or 'golden womb.'] In the Rigveda, a deity who is said to have arisen in the beginning, the one lord of all beings, who upholds heaven and earth and gives life and breath, and whose command even the gods obey. According to Manu he was Brahma, the first male, formed by the Self-existent Power, who in a golden egg remained at the sun. After a year Brahma divided the egg into 2 parts by his mere thought. One part became the heavens, the other the earth; and between them he placed the sky, the 8 regions, and the eternal abode of waters.

Hiren (hi'ren). [A corruption of the Greek Irene.] A strumpet, in a Peele's play "The Turkish Mahomet and Hiren the Fair Greek." The phrase, "Have we not Hiren here" which appears in Shakespeare's "Second Henry IV," "Eastward Hoe," and a number of 17th-century works, is an allusion to her. Pistol in Shakspere's "Henry IV." appears to apply the phrase to his sword. William Barksted wrote a poem called "Hiren, or the Fair Greek" in 1611.

Hirhor (hēr'hor). A high priest of Amun at Thebes, the founder of the 21st (illegitimate) dynasty of Egyptian kings, ruling at Thebes. Brugsch gives his date as 1100 B. C.

Hirlas Horn, The. A Welsh poem, written by Owain, prince of Powys, in the 12th century. The Hirlas horn is "a drinking-horn, long, blue, and all-ver-rimmed," which Owain fills and drinks to each of his chiefs, with a song.

Hirpini (hēr-pī'ni). In ancient history, an Italian people, of Samnite stock, living in southern Samnium in the district near Beneventum.

Hirsau (hir'sou), or Hirschau (hir'shou). A village in the Black Forest circle, Würtemberg, situated on the Nagold 21 miles west of Stuttgart. It was noted in the middle ages for its Benedictine monastery, built in the 11th century.

Hirschberg (hirsh'berg). A town in the province of Silesia, Prussia, at the junction of the Zacken and Bober, 60 miles west-southwest of Breslau. It is the center of trade in the Silesian Mountains, and the center of the Silesian linen manufacture. Population (1890), 16,214.

Hirson (hēr-sōn'). A town in the department of Aisne, France, on the Oise 33 miles northeast of Laon, noted for basket-making. Population (1891), commune, 6,294.

Hirtius (hèr'shi-us), Aulus. Killed near Mutina, Italy, 43 B. C. A Roman politician, a friend of Cæsar, the reputed author of the eighth book of Cæsar's "Commentaries on the Gallic War," and of the history of the Alexandrian war. As consul with Pansa (43) he defeated Antony at Mutina.

Hispalis (his'pa-lis), or Hispal (his'pal). The ancient name of Seville.

Hispania (his-pā'ni-ā). The ancient name of the Spanish peninsula.

Hispaniola. See Española and Haiti.

Hissar. 1. A dependency of Bokhara, central Asia, lying between Russian Turkestan on the north and Afghanistan (separated by the Amu Daria) on the south.—2. The chief town of Hissar, situated on the river Kafirnigan about lat. 38° 25′ N., long. 68° 28′ E. Population, about 15,000.

Hissar. 1. A division in the Panjab, British India. Area, 8,355 square miles. Population (1881), 1,311,067.—2. A district in the Hissar division, intersected by lat. 29° N., long. 76° E. Area, 3,540 square miles. Population (1881), 504,183.—3. The capital of the district of Hissar, situated in lat. 29° 10′ N., long. 75° 46′ E. Population, about 14,000.

Hissarlik. See Troy.

Histiæa (his-ti-ē'ā). [Gr. Ἱστίαια.] See Oreus.

Histiæus (his-ti-ē'us). [Gr. Ἱστιαῖος.] Executed at Sardis, Asia Minor, 494 B. C. A tyrant of Miletus, a friend of Darius I. of Persia.

Histoire Comique de Francion (es-twär' komēk' de fron-syōn'). [F., 'Comic History of Francion.'] A fiction by Charles Sorel, chiefly remarkable for the "evidence it gives of an attempt at an early date (1623) to write a novel of ordinary manners." Saintsbury.

Historia Miscella (his-tō'ri-ā mi-sel'ā). See the extract.

This curious farrago of history forms the first part of Muratori's great collection of the "Scriptores Rerum Italicarum." The first eleven books are substantially the work of Eutropius (the familiar Eutropius of our boyhood), and reach down to the death of Jovian. The authorship of the following books is generally attributed to Paulus Diaconus, of Aquileia, who died in 799, and the completion of the work to Landulf the Wise, who flourished in the eleventh century. Without going into the disputed question as to this authorship, it is sufficient to say that the writer, who is confessedly a mere compiler, interweaves large passages from Jornandes, Orosius, the Annalists, and the Ecclesiastical Historians.

Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, I. 431.

Histriomastix (his'tri-ō-mas'tiks). [LL., 'the player's scourge.'] A play by Marston, produced before 1599, in which year Jonson satirized it in his "Every Man out of his Humour." It was printed in 1610.

Histriomastix, the Player's Scourge, or Actor's Tragœdie. A treatise by William Prynne, published in 1632, though dated 1633. The book was designed to promote the total suppression of stage-plays. "Prynne's treatise, as is well known, led to his being summoned before the Star Chamber, and to that star Chamber, which condemned his book to be burnt, and the author to be expelled from the Bar and his Inn, to stand in the pillory, to lose both his ears, to pay a fine of £5,000 to the king, and to be perpetually imprisoned. . . . For, about the time when the book was published—according to one account on the day before, according to another but a few days after—Prynne's cousin, the ladies had themselves acted in a Pastoral at Whitehall." (Wood, Hist. Dran. Lit.) In 1669 a meek retraction entitled "Mr. William Prynn his Defence of Stage-Plays, or a Retractation of a former Book of his called Histrio-Mastix," was published.

Hit (hit). A town in the vilayet of Bagdad, Asiatic Turkey, situated on the Euphrates about 100 miles west-northwest of Bagdad: the ancient Is, famous for its springs of bitumen. Population (estimated), 2,500.

Hitchcock (hich'kok), Edward. Born at Deerfield, Mass., May 24, 1793: died at Amherst, Mass., Feb. 27, 1864. An American geologist, professor from 1825 of chemistry and natural history at Amherst College, and president of the college 1845–54, with the professorship of natural theology and geology. Among his works are "Geology of the Connecticut Valley" (1823), "Elementary Geology" (1840), "Fossil Footsteps" (1848), "Religion of Geology" (1851), "Illustrations of Surface Geology" (1856), "Supplement to the Ichnology of New England" (1863), "Elementary and Popular Treatise on Geology" (with Charles H. Hitchcock, 1869), "Anatomy and Physiology" (with Edward Hitchcock, Jr., 1870).

Hitchcock, Roswell Dwight. Born at East Machias, Maine, Aug. 15, 1817: died at Somerset, Mass., June 16, 1887. An American clergyman and theologian. He was appointed professor of church history at Union Theological Seminary (New York) in 1855, and president in 1880. He published "Complete Analysis of the Bible" (1869), "Socialism" (1879), etc.

Hitchin (hich'in). A town in Hertfordshire, England, 33 miles north by west of London. Population (1891), 8,860.

Hitchiti (hi-chē-tē'). A division of North American Indians. The name is from a Creek word, 'to look up' (c. f. Ikse, Ikisan). The Hitchiti proper lived on the Chattahoochee River, Georgia, and spread to Flint River through Georgia and Florida. The Seminoles were a half-Creek and half-Hitchiti people, and probably also the Yamassi also. See Creek. Also Echeetee, Etchita, Ichiti.

Hitopadesha (hi-tō-pa-dā'sha). In Sanskrit literature, the book of "Good Counsel." It was the first Sanskrit book printed in Naguri letters (see Devanagari) edited by Carey, and printed at Serampore in 1808. It had been already translated by Wilkins (Bath, 1787) and Sir William Jones (London, 1799). It is ethico-didactic, and is what the Hindus call a Nitisastra or conduct-work. The plan is simple. The sons of King Sudarshana are vicious. He convokes the wise men, and asks if any one is able to reform his sons. Vishnusharman offers to do so, takes them in charge, and relates to them the stories which make up the collection. The Hitopadesha is not an original work, but an excellent compilation of ancient material. The stories are expressly said to be "the Panchatantra and another work." The author or editor is said to have been Narayana and his patron, the prince Dhavalachandra. The work is at least 500 years old.

Hitteren (hit'ter-en). An island of Norway, west of Trondhjem. Length, 30 miles.

Hittites (hit'tits). An important tribe, descended from Heth, son of Canaan, the son of Ham, settled in the region of Hebron on the hill, and often mentioned as one of the seven principal Canaanite tribes, and sometimes as comprising the whole Canaanite population. Hittite kings are mentioned who seem to have dwelt north of Palestine. About the middle of the 9th century B. C. they disappear from biblical history. Some scholars, however, distinguish the latter as Syrian Hittites, whom they consider a different tribe from the Canaanite Hittites. They have lately been identified with the Cheta of the Egyptians and the Chatti of the Assyrian monuments. These monuments agree with the notices of the Old Testament in depicting the Hittites as a powerful tribe. Thothmes III., of the 18th dynasty, fought with them about 1600 B. C. in Megiddo, later Seti (attacked Kadesh in about 1400 B. C.), and Rameses II. (the supposed Pharaoh of the oppression) defeated them (about 1300 B. C.) at Kadesh, on the Orontes. The Cheta are also often referred to in the diplomatic correspondence of Tel-el-Amarna. The Hittites are found early in collision with Assyria. They were defeated by Tiglath-Pileser I. (1220–1100). Asurnazirpal (884–860) carried their princes into captivity. Under Shalmaneser II. the Hittites entered into an alliance with Ben-hadad of Syria, but were defeated in the great battle on the plains of Syria, and their city Carchemish was taken by Sargon. Twelve Hittite kings are enumerated as contemporary rulers at this time. Sargon finally put an end to the Hittite independence in 717, when the inhabitants of Carchemish were deported to Assyria and the city was repeopled with Assyrian colonists. Monuments, supposed to be Hittite, have been discovered since 1872 in Hamath, Aleppo, Carchemish, Cappadocia, Lycaonia, and Lydia, which would show that the Hittite empire once spread over the greater part of Asia Minor; and it may be that from there they at one time pushed their way into northern Syria. It is doubtful whether they formed one race with the Hittites of the Canaanite stock remains an open one. The originators of these Hittite monuments are considered by some scholars to have been a "Mongoloid" race. The style exhibited on these monuments is still of a primitive, rude character. The inscriptions, in hieroglyphic characters, have not yet been deciphered. Of the ethnological relations which authorities to consider the Hittites as a race speaking a Semitic language akin to Syriac or Aramaic, and to regard the so-called Hittite inscriptions as the work of another people who are, for the time being, called "pseudo-Hittites."

Hittorff (hit'torf), Jacques Ignace. Born at Cologne, Aug. 20, 1793: died at Paris, March 25, 1867. A French architect. His chief work is the church of St. Vincent de Paul, Paris. He published "Architecture antique de la Sicile" (1826–30), "Architecture moderne de la Sicile" (1826–35), "Architecture polychrome chez les Grecs" (1851), etc.

Hitzig (hit'sig), Ferdinand. Born at Hauingen, Baden, June 23, 1807: died at Heidelberg, Baden, Jan. 22, 1875. A German exegete, professor at Zurich (1833) and later (1861) at Heidelberg. He published commentaries on Isaiah (1833), the Psalms (1835–1836), the minor prophets (1838), Jeremiah (1841), etc.

Hoare, Sir Richard Colt. Born at Stourhead, Wilts, England, Dec. 9, 1758: died there, May 19, 1838. An English antiquary and topographer. His chief work is a "History of Modern Wiltshire" (1822–44).

Hoare, William. Born about 1706: died at Bath, England, Dec., 1792. An English historical and portrait painter.

Hobart (hō'bärt), sometimes written Hobarton (hō'bär-ton), or Hobart Town (hō'bärt toun or hō'bär-ton). The capital of Tasmania, situated on Sullivan's Cove, at the mouth of the river Derwent, in lat. 42° 53′ S., long. 147° 21′ E. It was founded in 1804, and is the chief commercial city of the colony. Population (1891), 24,905.

Hobart (hō'bärt), Augustus Charles, Hobart Pasha. Born at Walton-on-the-Wolds, Leicestershire, April 1, 1822: died at Milan, June 19, 1886. An English admiral in the Turkish service, third son of the sixth Earl of Buckinghamshire. He entered the British navy in 1835; became naval adviser to the Sultan of Turkey in 1867; suppressed the Cretan rebellion in 1867; was appointed admiral, with the title of pasha, in 1869; reorganized the Turkish fleet and operated against Russia in the Black Sea in 1877; and was promoted mushir or marshal of the Turkish empire in 1881.

Hobart, John Henry. Born at Philadelphia, Sept. 14, 1775: died at Auburn, N. Y., Sept. 10 (12–?), 1830. An American bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He was ordained priest in 1800, and became assistant bishop of New York in 1811 and bishop in 1816. He was one of the founders of the General Theological Seminary in New York city, in which he became professor of pastoral theology in 1821. His most notable publications are "Companion for the Altar" (1804) and "Apology for the Apostolic Order" (1807).

Hobbema (hob'be-mä), Meyndert or Minderhout. Born at Amsterdam, or Koevervlam, about 1638: died at Amsterdam, Dec., 1709. A Dutch landscape-painter. He was influenced in style by Ruisdael. He is noted for his atmospheric effects, tone, and brilliancy. In many of his landscapes figures have been painted by other artists. His picture of "The Hermitage, St. Petersburg" (1663) is owned by the New York Historical Society.

Hobbes (hobz), Thomas. Born at Westport (now in Malmesbury), Wiltshire, April 5, 1588: died at Hardwick Hall, Dec. 4, 1679. A celebrated English philosopher. His father, Thomas Hobbes, was vicar of Charlton and Westport. In 1603 Hobbes entered Magdalen Hall, Oxford, where he graduated in 1608. He soon entered the service of William Cavendish (first earl of Devonshire) as tutor to his eldest son (later second earl of Devonshire), and retained this position until the death of his pupil in 1628. They made a continental tour in 1610. In 1629 he became travelling tutor to the son of Sir Gervase Clifton, and visited Paris and, probably, Italy. He returned to the service of the Cavendishes in 1631 as tutor to the third Earl of Devonshire, with whom, 1634–37, he made an extended tour on the Continent, during which he established friendly relations with many distinguished men, including Galileo, Gassendi, Mersenne, and Descartes. Previous to this time (before 1629) he had served Bacon as amanuensis, and in translating some of his essays into Latin. He lived with Devonshire until 1640, when from apprehension of persecution for his political opinions drove him to Paris, where he remained until 1651, when, in the belief that his life was in danger from those who considered his heterodoxy and even atheism, he fled back to England and became reconciled to the Cromwellian government. For a time in 1646 he instructed the Prince of Wales (later Charles II.) in mathematics. After the Restoration he lived with the Earl of Devonshire. Hobbes was a pronounced nominalist in philosophy, an antagonist of scholasticism, one of the suggestors of the associational psychology, and a leader of modern rationalism. He insisted especially upon the complete separation of theology and philosophy, and the subordination of the church to the state. He is best known from his doctrine that the power of the state is absolute as against the individual — that it is the "Leviathan" that swallows all, a mortal god who, like the Deity, governs according to his pleasure, and gives peace and security to his subjects. His chief works are a translation of Thucydides, "De cive" (1642), "Human Nature, or the Fundamental Elements of Policy" (1650), "De corpore politico" (1650), "Leviathan, or the Matter, Form, and Power of a Commonwealth, Ecclesiastical and Civil" (1651), "Of Liberty and Necessity" (1654). His collected works were edited by Sir W. Molesworth 1839–45, in 16 vols. (5 in Latin).

Hogarth (hō'gärth), William. Born at London, Nov. 10, 1697; died at London, Oct. 26, 1764. A celebrated English painter and engraver. In 1712 he was apprenticed to Ellis Gamble, a silversmith; in 1718 he turned his attention to engraving; and in 1720 he first became known by his plates for "Hudibras." In 1729 he eloped with Sir James Thornhill's only daughter, and was married at Paddington church. He published in 1733 "The Rake's Progress," which was soon followed by "The Harlot's Progress." In 1735 Hogarth obtained the passage of an act securing the rights of artists to their own designs. In 1736 he painted on the staircase of St Bartholomew's Hospital "The Good Samaritan" and "The Pool of Bethesda." Among his other pictures are the "Distressed Poet" and the "Enraged Musician" (1741), "Marriage à la Mode" (1745), "Industry and Idleness" (1747). He made a famous journey to France in 1748. In his later years Hogarth indulged in literary compositions, and wrote "The Analysis of Beauty." He painted a number of portraits of himself, the best of which is in the National Gallery, London.

Hogarth is essentially a comic painter; his pictures are not indifferent, unimpassioned descriptions of human nature, but rich, exuberant satires upon it. He is carried away by a passion for the ridiculous. His object is "to show vice her own feature, scorn her own image." He is so far from restraining himself with still life that he is always on the verge of caricature, and only with difficulty is falling into it.

Hogarth Club. A London club for artists, established in 1870. It has a life class, sketching club, and reading-room.

A German historical and portrait painter and wood-engraver, son of Hans Holbein (1460–1524). He went to Basel in 1515, and matriculated in the painters' guild in 1517. His frescos in the city hall at Basel, and the "Passion" in the Basel Museum, were painted about 1521–22. In 1523 he painted the portrait of Erasmus at Longford Castle. About 1526 he visited Antwerp to see Quentin Massys, and about that year went to England, where he was lodged at Sir Thomas More's house, near London. In 1528 he went to Basel, and returned to England in 1532, where he remained for the rest of his life. He became court painter to Henry VIII about 1536. Among his works are a series of 89 sketches in red chalk and India ink, belonging to the royal collection in the Windsor collection; a series of designs for wood-engraving, "The Dance of Death," engraved by Hans Lutzelburger, published in 1538 and the portrait of Sir Thomas More (1527); a portrait of Anne of Cleves (1539); a number of portraits of German merchant goldsmiths of the Steelyard, some of which are in Germany; "The Ambassadors" (in the National Gallery, London); and portraits of Henry VIII. and of the principal personages of the time. He also designed the title-pages to Coverdale's and Cranmer's Bibles, and painted some important works with religious subjects ("The Last Supper," "The Dead Christ," eight Passion-plays, etc., all in the museum at Basel; "The Nativity" and "The Adoration of the Magi," in the Dresden-Briefgaux; "Madonna," with the Meyer family at Darmstadt; "Madonna and Saints," at Solothurn, etc.).

Holberg (hol'berg), Ludvig von. Born at Bergen, Norway, Dec. 3, 1684; died at Copenhagen, Jan. 28, 1754. The father of Danish drama, and the greatest name in Danish literature. His father, who had risen from a common soldier to the rank of colonel, died when he was still an infant, and his mother when he was but 10 years old. He had been intended for the army, but showed such an aptitude for study that he was sent to the Bergen Latin school, and in 1702 he entered the Copenhagen University. Being destitute of means, he soon came back again to Norway, and was tutor in the family of a clergyman at Voss. A year later he again went to Copenhagen, where he studied theology and took his examination, but shortly after returned to Norway and was again a tutor, this time with a clergyman at Bergen. This latter had been a great traveler, and Holberg, through the perusal of his library, and by what he said to him, got a desire to see the world. He accordingly set out for Holland, but went only as far as Aix-la-Chapelle. The year after he returned to Norway and settled at Christiansand, where he taught French during the winter. The following spring he went to England and remained 2 years, chiefly at Oxford, where he supported himself by teaching languages and music. Returning to Copenhagen, he established himself as docent at the university, but soon after accepted the post of private tutor, and accompanied his charge to Germany. Upon the latter's death he again became a tutor until the year after (1710), when he was admitted as a stipendiary at Borch's Collegium in Copenhagen, where he was finally enabled to devote himself to literary work. In 1711 he published his first work, "Introduction til den Europæiske Rigers Historie" ("Introduction to the History of the Nations of Europe"). In 1714 he was made professor extraordinarius, but without a stipend. Shortly after, however, he was made the beneficiary of the "Rosenkrantz fund," and was thus enabled to go abroad. He accordingly sailed to Holland; from Holland on foot to Brussels to Paris, where he remained for a year and a half; proceeded again, partly on foot, to Marseilles and Genoa, where he fell ill; and afterward went on to Rome, where he remained the whole winter. The following Feb. he set out again for Denmark, making the whole journey from Rome to Paris on foot. In 1718 he was made professor of metaphysics at Copenhagen; later he became professor of Latin and rhetoric, and ultimately (1730) of history and geography. In 1720–21 appeared, under the pseudonym Hans Mikkelsen, the first of his characteristic productions, the comic-heroic poem "Peder Paars." In 1722 he began to write comedies. Up to this year, when the Danish theater was opened with a translation of Molière's "L'Avare," there had been French and German but no Danish theaters in Copenhagen. Holberg was applied to to write Danish comedies, and this year the first of them was produced: "Den politiske Kandestøber" ("The Pewterer Politician"). Five plays were furnished during the year, and ultimately he had written 33. Among the most notable of these, besides the one mentioned, are "Den Stundesløse" ("The Busy Man"), "Erasmus Montanus," "Barselstuen" ("The Lying-in Room"), "Jeppe paa Bjerget" ("Jeppe of the Mountain"), "Jacob von Thybo," "Den Vægelsindede" ("The Weak Woman"). In 1725 he again went abroad, and remained during the winter in Paris. After 1728, the year of the great conflagration in Copenhagen, and during the reign of Christian VI., no more plays were written; but when the theater was reopened in 1747, on the accession of Frederick V., several more were furnished, before, however, to his earliest comedies. In 1741 was published in Latin, at Leipsic, "Nicholai Klimii iter subterraneum"—in the Danish translation by Baggesen: "Niels Klims underjordiske Reise" ("Niels Klim's Underground Journey"). He was ennobled in 1747. The considerable property that he had accumulated was left, at his death, to the Sorø Academy. He was buried in the Sorø church. He always wrote in Latin his historical and other works, among them "Danmarks Riges Historie" ("The History of the Kingdom of Denmark"), in 3 vols., an autobiography in 3 letters written in Latin, and several humorous poems and lyrics. He has been called "the founder of modern Danish literature."

Holinshed (hol'inz-hed), or Hollingshead (hol'ingz-hed), Raphael. Born probably at Sutton Downes, Cheshire: died about 1580. An English chronicler. He is said to have been educated at one of the universities, possibly Cambridge. His great work, "Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland," was begun for Reginald Wolfe, a London printer, whose service he entered as translator early in the reign of Elizabeth. (See the extract.) A second and enlarged edition, edited by John Hooker, was published after Holinshed's death (1587).

About 1548 Wolfe designed a universal history and cosmography, with maps and illustrations. He had inherited Leland's notes, and his binder began the compilation of the English, Scottish, and Irish portions. Holinshed worked for some years under his direction, and had free access to Leland's manuscripts. After five-and-twenty years travell spent therein,' Wolfe died in 1573. No part of the great project was then ready for publication, but three well-known publishers, George Bishop, John Harrison, and Lukc or Lucas Harrison, determined to persevere with it, and Holinshed continued his labours in their service. Abandoning the size the work seemed likely to assume, Wolfe's successors resolved to limit their plan to histories and descriptions of England, Scotland, and Ireland only, and to omit maps. William Harrison was engaged to assist Holinshed in the descriptions of England and Scotland, and Richard Stanihurst to continue from 1509 to 1547 the history of Ireland, which Holinshed had compiled chiefly from a manuscript by Edmund Campion. At length, on 1 July, 1577, a license for publishing "Raphael Holingesheds Cronycle" was issued to John Harrison and George Bishop, on payment of the unusually high fee of 20s. and a copy. *Dict. Holland, Philemon. Born at Chelmsford, Essex, 1552: died at Coventry, Feb. 9, 1637. An English writer, noted as a translator. He graduated at Cambridge (Trinity College) in 1574, and after 1595 lived at Coventry. His translations include Livy (1600), the "Natural History" of Pliny (1601), the "Morals" of Plutarch (1603), the "History of the Cæsars" of Suetonius (1606), Camden's "Britannia" (1610), and the "Cyropædia" (1632).

Holland House. A mansion in Kensington, London, especially noted as a social center during the life of the third Lord Holland. It took its name from Henry Rich, earl of Holland, by whose father-in-law, Sir Walter Cope, it was built in 1607.

Hollar (hol'lär), Wenceslaus (Vaclav Holar). Born at Prague, July 13, 1607: died March 28, 1677. An engraver, a pupil of Matthäus Merian at Frankfort. He traveled extensively, making plates of views in the various cities he visited. The Earl of Arundel, ambassador to the emperor in 1636, discovered Hollar and brought him to England. About 1639 he became teacher of drawing to the Prince of Wales, and was made royal designer on the prince's accession as Charles II. Hollar enlisted with the Royalists in the civil war, and was made prisoner at Basing House in 1645. On regaining his liberty he joined the Earl of Arundel at Antwerp, returning to England in 1652. He was afterward sent with Lord Howard to Tangier to make topographical drawings. In 1640 appeared 26 plates entitled "Ornatus Muliebris Anglicanus, or Several Habits of English Women, etc.," followed in 1643 by illustrations of feminine costumes in other parts of Europe. In 1672 he made plates of Lincoln, York, etc. His reading of architecture is especially fine.

Holles (holz), Denzil, Baron Holles. Born Oct. 31, 1599: died Feb. 17, 1679. An English statesman, second son of the first Earl of Clare. He was the brother-in-law of Strafford. In 1624 he entered Parliament, and, on March 2, 1629, was one of the three who held the speaker in his chair when he attempted to adjourn the House at the king's order. Two days later he was arrested and sent to the Tower. He refused to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the courts over what was done in Parliament, and was heavily fined. The sum of £5,000 was voted to him by the Long Parliament as compensation for his losses in the affair. He was an influential member of this Parliament, was one of the members impeached by the king Jan. 3, 1642, and fought for the Parliament at Edgehill and Brentford. Later he became a prominent advocate of peace and an agreement with the king, was opposed to the Independents, and in 1647 was impeached with brothers by the army. On Dec. 6, 1648, and in Dec., 1659, was expelled from Parliament. On the Restoration he was created Baron Holles, and was ambassador at Paris 1663–65.

He was pastor of a church at Cambridge, Massachusetts, 1792–1832. Author of "Annals of America" (1805: new ed., bringing the narrative down to 1826, 1829).

Holmes, Oliver Wendell. Born at Cambridge, Mass., Aug. 29, 1809. An American poet, essayist, and novelist, son of Abiel Holmes. He was professor of anatomy and physiology in the medical school of Harvard University from 1847 to 1882, when he resigned and was appointed professor emeritus. He contributed to the "Atlantic Monthly" the "Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table" (1857–58), "Professor at the Breakfast-Table" (1859), and "Poet at the Breakfast-Table" (1872); and wrote the novels "Elsie Venner" (1861), "The Guardian Angel" (1868), and "A Mortal Antipathy" (1885). His collected works were collected in "Songs in Many Keys" (1861), "Humorous Poems" (1865), "Songs of Many Seasons" (1874), "Before the Curfew" (1888). He has also written a number of volumes of essays, and memoirs of Ralph Waldo Emerson (1885) and of John Lothrop Motley (1879). "Over the Teacups" (1890) is a work of the same kind as the "Autocrat."

Holofernes (hol-o-fėr'nēz), [Gk. Ὀλοφέρνης, also Ὀνοφέρνης, Onophernes], a general of Nebuchadnezzar: the leading character in the book of Judith (Apocrypha). He was killed by Judith.

Holofernes, or Holophernes. 1. A conventional character of Italian comedy: a pedant or pompous schoolmaster.—2. A pedant in Rabelais's "Gargantua and Pantagruel." He teaches Gargantua to say the alphabet backward in 5 years and 3 months.—3. A pompous schoolmaster in Shakspere's "Love's Labour's Lost," taken from the conventional character of Italian comedy.

As for the notion of certain critics, that Holofernes was meant for a satire upon John Florio, whose "Second Fruits" appeared in 1591, containing some reflections on the indecorum of the English stage, we cannot discover the slightest ground for it. Shakespeare, no doubt, had ample occasion to laugh at the pedantry of pedagogues long before he knew any thing of Florio.

Hudson, Int. to Love's Labour's Lost.

Holst (hōlst). Hans Peter. Born at Copenhagen, Oct. 22, 1811: died June 2, 1893. A Danish poet. After having been successively a teacher and a newspaper editor, he became, in 1875, dramaturgist to the royal theater at Copenhagen. He founded in 1868 the magazine "For Romantik og Historie," and was the author of "Ude og Hjemme," "Den lille Hornblæser" (1849), etc.

Holst (hōlst), Hermann Eduard von. Born at Fellin, Livonia, Russia, June 19 (N. S.), 1841. A German historian. He came to the United States in 1866, and settled at New York, where he contributed to the press, and in 1869 became assistant editor of the "Deutsch-Amerikanisches Conversations-Lexikon." He became professor of history at Strasburg University in 1872, at the University of Freiburg in 1874, and at Chicago University in 1892. Among his works are "Verfassungsgeschichte der Vereinigten Staaten von Amerika" (1885–), translated into English as "Constitutional and Political History of the United States," and "Life of John Calhoun" (1881).

Holstein (hol'stīn). The southern part of the province of Schleswig-Holstein, Prussia, separated from Schleswig by the Eider and the Baltic Canal. The chief place is Kiel. The surface is generally low. It formed part of the realm of Charles the Great, and was a count-palatine in the middle ages. South Jutland was united with Holstein in 1325. Schleswig and Holstein were formally united in 1386. Holstein continued a fief of the empire, became a duchy in 1474, acquired Dithmarschen in 1559, and was incorporated with Denmark in 1806. It continued under Danish rule, but the King of Denmark entered the Germanic Confederation for Holstein in 1815. It received representative government in 1831; was invaded in the Schleswig-Holstein war; was assigned to Austria in 1865; and was annexed by Prussia in 1866. See Schleswig and Schleswig Holstein.

Holub (ho'lōb), Emil. Born at Holitz, Bohemia, Oct. 7, 1847. An African explorer. After practising medicine at the diamond-fields of South Africa (1872), he took to scientific exploration and collecting. He first explored the Transvaal (1873–74); reached the Zambesi River, via Shoshong, in 1875; and, after a visit to the Barotse, returning to Europe in 1879. In 1884 he was again at the Cape and on his way to the Zambesi. The looting of his camp by the Matabele obliged him to turn back in 1887. His young wife accompanied him on this second exploration of the Zambesi valley, and rendered heroic service. He has written "Seven Years in South Africa" (1890), etc.

Holy Alliance, The. A league formed by the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, and Prussia in person after the fall of Napoleon, signed at Paris Sept. 26, 1815, and afterward joined by all the other European sovereigns except the Emperor of Rome and England. Its professed object was to unite their respective governments in a Christian brotherhood, but its real one was to perpetuate existing dynasties by their joint opposition to all attempts at change. A special clause debarred any member of the Bonaparte family from ascending a European throne. The league came to an end after the French revolution of 1830.

Holyoke, Mount. The chief point in a low range (Holyoke range) in western Massachusetts, southeast of Northampton. Height, 955 feet.

Holy Roman Empire, or German-Roman Empire, often called the German Empire, G. Römisches Reich deutscher Nation (re'mish-es rēch deutsh'er nā'tsi-on) or Deutsches Reich (deutsh'es rēch). The realm ruled by the emperor who claimed to be the representative of the ancient Roman emperors, and who asserted (in theory) authority over the nations of western and central Europe; called "holy" from the interdependence of the empire and the church. It comprised in general the German-speaking peoples in central Europe, and for a long time Lorraine, connecting with Italy. Various regions outside of Germany proper were at different times under the empire. It began with Charles the Great, King of the Franks, who became emperor of the West 800, and was succeeded by various Carolingian emperors. By the treaty of Verdun (843) the Carolingian dominion continued in the eastern part of Charlemagne's empire (i.e. Germany). The German nation grew from the union of Thuringians, Franks, Saxons, Bavarians, Swabians, Lorrainers, etc., the Saxon line of German kings ending with Henry the Fowler in 919. The lasting union of Germany with the empire began in 962, when Otto I., king of Germany, became Roman emperor. The Saxon line of emperors continued till 1024. The Franconian line (Henry III., Henry IV., Henry V., etc.) reigned from 1024 to 1125; the Hohenstaufen or Swabian line (Conrad III., Frederick Barbarossa, Frederick II., etc.) from 1138 to 1254. There was an interregnum from 1254 to 1273. Emperors from the Hapsburg, Luxemburg, and other houses reigned from 1273–1806. The continuous line of Hapsburg emperors, who were powerful Austrian rulers, began in 1438. After Maximilian I. and Charles V. the empire degenerated through the 17th and 18th centuries; and Francis II. (Francis I. of Austria) abdicated as the last emperor in 1806. The emperors were elected. The number of electors was fixed at seven by the Golden Bull of 1356—the archbishops of Mainz, Treves, and Cologne, the Count Palatine of the Rhine, the King of Bohemia, the Duke of Saxony, and the Margrave of Brandenburg. Bavaria and Hannover were respectively made electorates in 1623 and 1692. The empire was immediately before the fall of the empire Wurtemberg, Hesse-Cassel, and Salzburg. By Maximilian I. the empire was divided into ten circles—Burgundian, Westphalian, Lower-Rhine, Upper-Rhine, Lower Saxon, Upper Saxon, Franconian, Swabian, Bavarian, and Austrian. Holyrood (hō'li-rōd) Palace. An ancient royal palace of Scotland, situated at Edinburgh. It was originally an abbey, founded 1128; was several times burned; and was the scene of the murder of Rizzio (1566). It is a large and picturesque castellated structure, in its existing form chiefly about 1670. The apartments of Mary, Queen of Scots, are preserved. The palace replaced Holyrood Abbey, to which belonged the fine ruined Early English church, whose tracery, arcades, and other details are admirable. The abbey possessed the ancient privilege of sanctuary, and for debtors this survived until 1880, when imprisonment for debt was abolished.

Holy Sepulcher, Church of the. A church at Jerusalem, consecrated in 336. The original building was in the form of a rotunda, whose shape at least, survives in the existing complex structure. It assumed various forms in the course of the middle ages, and was in great part rebuilt after a fire in 1808. The chief entrance is from a court on the south, and has handsome recessed pointed Norman-Saracenic arches. In the interior is the sepulcher proper, inclosed in a 16-sided chapel beneath a dome 65 feet in diameter resting on 18 piers, together with a great number of chapels appropriated to different creeds and nationalities, or marking various spots traditionally connected with the Saviour's passion. Much of the 12th-century Church of the Crusaders, originally distinct from the Holy sepulcher, is included in the existing edifice: it presents beautiful details of the French architecture of the style of transition to the Pointed.

Holy Thorn. See Glastonbury.

Holy War, The. 1. A work by Thomas Fuller, published in 1640: his first important book.—2. A work by John Bunyan, published in 1682.

Holywell (hol'i-wel). A town in Flintshire, North Wales, situated near the estuary of the Dee, 14 miles southwest of Liverpool. Population (1891), 3,018.

Holywell street. A London street parallel to the Strand from Newcastle street to St. Clement Danes Church: so named from a "holy well" in that locality. It is occupied chiefly by book-shops, and was formerly notorious as a place of sale for obscene literature.

Holzminden (hölts'min-den). A town in Brunswick, Germany, on the Weser 40 miles southsouthwest of Hanover. It has a school of engineering. Population (1890), 8,787.

Homam (hō-mām'). [Ar. sa'd al-homam, the lucky star of the hero.] The third-magnitude star ρ Pegasi.

Homberg (hom'berg). Wilhelm. Born at Batavia, Java, Jan. 8, 1652: died at Paris, Sept. 24, 1715. A chemist of German descent. He discovered boracic acid and "Homberg's phosphorus."

Homburg, or Homburg-vor-der-Höhe (hom'-bōrg-for-der-hē'e). A town in the province of Hesse-Nassau, Prussia, on a spur of the Taunus 9 miles north-northwest of Frankfort-on-the-Main. It is one of the most frequented watering-places in Germany, noted for numerous springs, and for its gaming-tables. It has a castle. It was the capital to 1866 of the former landgraviate of Hesse-Homburg. Population (1890), commune, 8,863.

Homburg, a small town in the Palatinate, Bavaria, 43 miles southeast of Treves.

Home (hōm), Sir Everard. Born at Hull, England, May 6, 1756; died at London, Aug. 31, 1832. A Scottish surgeon and anatomist. He was a pupil of his brother-in-law John Hunter, and later his assistant. From 1813 he was surgeon to Chelsea hospital. He wrote "Lectures on Comparative Anatomy" (1814–28), etc.

Home, Henry, Lord Kames. Born at Kames, Berwickshire, Scotland, 1696: died at Edinburgh, Dec. 27, 1782. A Scottish judge and philosophical writer. He published "Essays on the Principles of Morality and Natural Religion" (1751), "Elements of Criticism" (1762), and various legal works.

Home, John. Born at Leith, Scotland, Sept. 21, 1722: died near Edinburgh, Sept. 5, 1808. A Scottish clergyman and dramatist, author of "Douglas" (which see). He was settled as minister at Athelstaneford in East Lothian. His connection with the stage aroused clerical hostility, and proceedings against him were begun in the presbytery: but he resigned in 1757. He also wrote "Agis" (acted 1778), "The Fatal Discovery" (1769), "Alonzo" (1773), "Alfred" (1778).

Home as Found. A novel by Cooper, published in 1838.

Home Counties. A name given to the English counties containing London and in its immediate neighborhood. They are Middlesex, Surrey, Kent, Essex, and Hertford.

Homer (hō'mėr). [L. Homerus, Gr. Ὅμηρος, one who puts together; a hostage: a pledge agreed upon between two parties.] The poet to whom is assigned by very ancient tradition the authorship of the Iliad and the Odyssey, and of certain hymns to Hermes, Aphrodite, Apollo, Pan, Hera, Demeter, Dionysus, Athena, Artemis, Ares, and Athens—contended for the honor of being his birthplace: of these, the best evidence connects him with Smyrna. He was said to have died on the island of Ios. The tradition that he lived on the island of Chios, and in his old age was blind, is supported by the Hymn to the Delian Apollo. Modern destructive criticism has led to the doubt whether such a person as Homer existed at all, the great epics which bear that name being supposed to be, in their existing form, of a composite character, the product of various persons and ages. It is altogether probable, however, that the nucleus of the Iliad, at least, was the work of a single poet of commanding genius. (See Iliad, Odyssey, and the quotation below.) Various dates have been assigned to Homer. According to Herodotus he lived about 850 B. C.; others give a later date, and some a date as early as 1200 B. C. His poems were sung by professional reciters (rhapsodists), who went from city to city. (See Homeridæ.) They were given substantially their present form by Pisistratus or his sons Hipparchus and Hippias, who ordered the rhapsodists to recite them at the Panathenaic festival in their order and completeness. The present text of the poems, with their division into books, is based upon the work of the Alexandrine critics.

We may assume it as certain that there existed in Ionia schools or fraternities of epic rhapsodists who composed and recited heroic lays at feasts, and often had friendly contests in these recitations. The origin of these recitations may be sought in northern Greece, from which the fashion migrated in early days to Asia Minor. We may assume that these singers became popular in many parts of Greece, and that they wandered from court to court, glorifying the heroic ancestors of the various chiefs. One among them, called Homer, was endowed with a genius superior to the rest, and struck out a plot capable of nobler and larger treatment. It is likely that this superiority was not recognized at the time, and that he remained all his life a singer like the rest, a wandering minstrel, possibly poor and blind. The listening public probably stamped his poem with their approval, they demanded its frequent recitation, and so this Homer began to attain a great posthumous fame. But when this fame had begun to inquire into his life and history, it had already passed out of recollection, and men supplied by fables what they had forgotten or neglected. The rhapsodists, however, then turned their attention to expanding and perfecting his poem, which was greatly enlarged and called the Iliad. In doing this they had recourse to the art of writing, which seems to have been in use when Homer flourished; but it was not certainly employed when the plan was enlarged with episodes. The home of the original Homer seems to have been about Smyrna, and in contact with both Æolic and Ionic legends. His date is quite uncertain; it need not be placed before 800 B. C., and is perhaps later, but not after 700 B. C.

Homer, Winslow, Born at Boston, Feb. 24, 1836. An American genre-painter. In 1861 he went to Washington, and three times accompanied the Army of the Potomac in its campaigns. His first oil pictures were war scenes; among them is the famous "Prisoners from the Front." In later years he lived chiefly in New York. He was elected national academician in 1865. He has produced many works in oils, in water-colors, and in black and white. Among his pictures are "The Life-Line" (1884), "Lumbering in Maine" (1885), etc.

Homeric Hymns. A group of Greek hexameter poems, 5 of considerable length and 29 shorter, anciently ascribed to Homer. Each is inscribed to and relates a legend concerning a god or goddess. The most noted are the Hymn to the Delian Apollo, "in which an account is given of the birth of Apollo and of the ancient festival at Delos (the author describing himself as the blind bard of rocky Chios); the 'Hymn to the Pythian Apollo'"; and the hymns to Hermes, Demeter, and Aphrodite.

The Homeric Hymns are essentially secular and not religious; they seem distinctly intended to be recited in competitive rhapsodies, and in some cases even the direct pay; they are all in form preludes . . . to longer recitations, apparently of epic poems, though the longer five are expanded rhapsodies, and the Delian Apollo, to which an account is given of the birth of Apollo and of the ancient festival at Delos (the author describing himself as the blind bard of rocky Chios); the 'Hymn to the Pythian Apollo'"; and the hymns to Hermes, Demeter, and Aphrodite.

Home Rule Bills. Two bills introduced into the British Parliament by Mr. Gladstone, the object of which was to provide a separate legislature for Ireland. The first, introduced in 1886, was defeated on the second reading, June 7; the second, introduced in 1893, passed the House of Commons sept. 1, but was thrown out by the House of Lords Sept. 8, by 419 votes to 41.

Homespun (hōm'spun), Zekiel and Cicely. Brother and sister in Colman the younger's play "The Heir-at-Law." Their names are almost a synonym for rustic worth and simplicity.

Homestead (hōm'sted). A town near Birmingham, Pennsylvania, noted for the manufacture of steel plates and rails. It was the scene of a strike and shut-down from July to Nov., 1892, which was attended with very serious disturbances. A body of detectives who attempted to gain access to the steel-works in two barges were attacked by the strikers. Winchester rifles and cannon were used in the fight, and oil was poured on the river and set on fire to burn the barges. Many on both sides were killed or wounded.

Home, Sweet Home. A favorite English song. The music is in Bishop's opera "Clari, or the Maid of Milan." It is called a Sicilian air, but is probably Bishop's. The words were written by John Howard Payne.

Homeward Bound. A novel by Cooper, published in 1838.

Homildon (hom'l-don) Hill. A height near Wooler, in Northumberland, England, where the English under Percy defeated the Scots under Douglas in Sept., 1402.

Homme Armé, L' (lom ăr-mā'). [F., 'The Armed Man'; OF. Lome armé, Lomme armé.] 1. An old French chanson, the melody of which was used by some of the musicians of the 15th and 16th centuries as the canto fermo of a certain kind of mass called the "Missa L'Homme armé." The origin of the song has given rise to much speculation.—2. A French dance-tune said to date from the 15th century, and printed with sacred words at Antwerp in 1565. Grove.

Homme qui Rit, L'. [F., 'The Man who Laughs.'] A romance by Victor Hugo, published in 1869.

Honduras (hon-dö'räs). [Sp. Honduras, lit. 'depths,' pl. of hondura, depth, from hondo, deep, from L. fundus, bottom. The name is said to refer to the difficulty the first explorers had in finding anchorage off the coast.] A republic of Central America, bounded by Guatemala on the northwest, the Caribbean Sea on the north, Nicaragua on the southeast and south, the Pacific Ocean on the south, and San Salvador on the southwest. Capital, since June, 1883, Tegucigalpa: the old capital was Comayagua. The surface is much varied, with numerous mountain-chains, especially in the west, and high, open valleys and plateaus; on the northern coast there are extensive forest-covered alluvions. The climate of the high lands is temperate and healthful; portions of the coast are hot and insalubrious. The valleys are very fertile, and the high plains support large herds of cattle. Gold, silver, etc., are mined, though not on an extensive scale. The principal exports are fruits, cabinet woods, hides, indigo, and precious metals. A large proportion of the inhabitants are Mestizos or Indians. Spanish is the common language, and the prevailing religion is Roman Catholic. The executive is vested in a president elected for four years; congress consists of a single house. Honduras was discovered by Columbus in 1502; was conquered by the Spanish 1523–36; formed a colonial intendencia or province in the captaincy of Guatemala; was a state in the Central American union 1824–39; and has since been independent. It has suffered from political revolutions and from wars with Salvador, Guatemala, and Nicaragua. Area, 46,400 square miles. Population (1886), about 380,000.

Honduras, Bay of. An arm of the Caribbean Sea, lying north of Honduras and east of British Honduras and Yucatan.

Honduras, British. See British Honduras.

Hone (hōn), William. Born at Bath, England, June 3, 1780 (1779 ?): died at Tottenham, near London, Nov., 1842. An English political satirist and miscellaneous writer. His best-known works are "Every-day Book" (1826), "Table-book" (1827–1828), "Year-book" (1829).

Honeycomb (hun'i-kōm), Henry. A pseudonym of Leigh Hunt. He professes to be a descendant of the Will Honeycomb in the "Spectator."

Honeycomb, Will. One of the imaginary club publishing the "Spectator."

The characters of Will Wimble and Will Honeycomb are not a whit behind their friend, Sir Roger, in delicacy and felicity. The delightful simplicity and good-humoured officiousness in the one are set off by the graceful affectation and courtly pretension in the other.

Hazlitt, Eng. Poets, p. 130.

Honeymoon, The. A comedy by John Tobin, produced in 1805. It is, to some extent, based on Shakspere's "Taming of the Shrew," with ideas from Fletcher and Shirley.

Honeywood. The "good natured man" in Goldsmith's play of that name. He suffers from a foolish eagerness to please, even wishing to give up the woman he loves to a friend who also loves her. He is cured by Sir William Honeywood, his uncle.

Honfleur (on-flēr'). A seaport in the department of Calvados, France, situated on the estuary of the Seine nearly opposite Havre. It has considerable export trade to England, formerly to a much more importance. It was frequently taken and retaken during the Hundred Years' War. Population (1891), commune, 9,450.

Hong-Kong (hong'kong'). [Properly Hiang-Kiang, fragrant streams.] An island belonging to Great Britain, lying off the province of Kwang-tung, China, near the mouth of the Canton River, in lat. 22° 17′ N., long. 114° 10′ E. Chief place, Victoria. The surface is mountainous. It was ceded by China to Great Britain in 1841 (confirmed in 1842), and is a crown colony and naval station. It is an important commercial center and free port. The chief exports are tea and silk; the chief import, opium. Area, 29 square miles. Population (1891), 221,441.

Honiton (hon'i-ton). A town in Devonshire, England, situated on the river Otter 16 miles east-northeast of Exeter. It has long been noted for the manufacture of lace. Population (1891), 3,216.

Honolulu (hō-nō-lö'lö). The capital of the Hawaiian Islands, situated on the southern coast of Oahu, in lat. 21° 18′ N., long. 157° 52′ W. It has the only good harbor in the islands, and is their chief seaport and seat of commerce. It was the center of the revolutionary movement of 1893. Population (1890), 20,487.

Honoré, Rue St-. See Rue St.-Honoré.

Honoria (hō-nō'ri-ä). Justa Grata. A Roman princess. She was the daughter of Constantius III., emperor of the West, and Galla Placidia, and was born about 418 A. D. Detected in a scandalous intrigue or marriage with Eugenius, a chamberlain of the palace, she was sent by her mother to the court of Theodosius at Constantinople, where for sixteen years she led a more or less closely guarded. She is said to have sent, either before or after her disgrace, a ring to Attila, with the request that he claim her as his bride. Subsequently, in 450, when seeking a cause of quarrel with the Western Empire, Attila sent an embassy to Valentinian, claiming the person of Honoria and her share in the empire. The date of her death is not known.

Honorius (hō-nō'ri-us) I. Died 638. Pope 625–638. He delivered an opinion favorable to Monothelitism in a letter to Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople, about 634, in consequence of which he was condemned by the sixth ecumenical council, held at Constantinople in 680.

Honorius II. (Peter Cadolaus). Died 1073. Antipope. He was elected by the Lombard bishops, acting under the influence of the empress Agnes, in opposition to Alexander II., and was deposed by the Council of Milan in 1064.

Honorius II. (Lambert di Fagnano). Died 1130. Pope 1124–30. He concluded, while cardinal-bishop of Ostia, the Concordat of Worms with Henry V. (1122). He was elevated to the holy see in opposition to the antipope Celestine III. by the powerful family of the Frangipani. He confirmed the order of the Templars at the Synod of Troyes in 1128.

Honorius III. (Cencio Savelli). Died 1227. Pope 1216–27. He confirmed the order of the Dominicans in 1216, and that of the Franciscans in 1223.

Honorius IV. (Giacomo Savelli). Died 1287. Pope 1285–87.

Honorius, Flavius. Born at Constantinople, Sept. 9, 384 A. D.: died at Ravenna, Aug. 27, 423. Emperor of the West. He was the second son of Theodosius, whom he succeeded in the western half of the empire in 395, while his brother Arcadius inherited the eastern half. He was, by the will of his father, placed under the guardianship of Stilicho, whose daughter Maria he married in 398. Stilicho defeated Alaric at Pollentia in 403, and in 406 repulsed the invasion of Radagaisus (who penetrated as far as Florence), but was put to death at the instance of the emperor in 408. In 410 Rome was taken and sacked by Alaric. During the reign of Honorius the West Goths, Franks, and Burgundians settled in Gaul, and the Suevi, Vandals, and Alani in Spain, while Britain and Armorica made themselves virtually independent.

Hontheim (hont'him), Johann Nikolaus von. Born at Trier, Prussia, Jan. 27, 1701: died at Montquintin, Luxemburg, Sept. 2, 1790. A German Roman Catholic prelate, bishop in partibus of Myriophus, and suffragan bishop of Treves: an opponent of Ultramontanism. His chief work is "De statu ecclesiæ et legitima potestate Romani pontificis" (published under the pseudonym of Justinus Febronius, 1763).

lem, Netherlands, about 1681. A Dutch genre-painter. He was a pupil of Nicolas Berghem.

Hoochow-fu (hō-chou'fō'). A city in the province of Chekiang, China, 53 miles north-northwest of Hangchow-fu: one of the principal centers of the silk industry.

Hood (hud), John Bell. Born at Owingsville, Bath County, Ky., June 1, 1831; died at New Orleans, Aug. 30, 1879. A Confederate soldier in the Civil War. He graduated at West Point in 1853; entered the Confederate army at the beginning of the Civil War; commanded a division of Lee's army at Antietam and at Gettysburg; commanded a brigade under General Bragg at Chickamauga; was promoted lieutenant-general; and in 1864 succeeded General Johnston as commander-in-chief of the army opposed to General Sherman in Georgia. Abandoning the defensive policy of his predecessor, he attacked General Sherman on the 22d and 28th of July, 1864, but was repulsed with heavy loss, and compelled to abandon Atlanta Sept. 1, 1864. He was defeated by General Thomas at the decisive battle of Nashville, Dec. 16, 1864, and was relieved of his command in Jan., 1865.

Hood, Mount. One of the most celebrated summits of the Cascade Range, in Oregon, about lat. 45° 24′ N., long. 121° 40′ W. Height given as 11,200 feet and as 11,934 feet.

Hood, Robin. A traditionary English outlaw and popular hero. He is said to have been born at Locksley, Nottinghamshire, about 1160. He lived in the woods with his band, either for reasons of his own or because he was really outlawed, his haunts being chiefly Sherwood Forest and Barnsdale in Yorkshire. He is also said to have been the outlawed Earl of Huntingdon. He was extravagant and adventurous, and though kind to the poor robbed the rich. He was contemporary with the priores of Kirkley, to whose cache he had intrusted himself to be fed when he was a very old man, treacherously allowed himself to be bled to death. His companions were Friar Tuck, Maid Marian, Little John, Will Scarlett, Allen-a-Dale, and George-a-Greene. He is a favorite subject in ballad tradition, and in fact the ballads are to all appearance the original source of the historical conceptions of him. He is intimately associated with the May-day festivities. There was a distinct set of sports in vogue at the beginning of the 16th century called the Robin Hood sports. These represented the adventures of Robin and his band, but were finally absorbed in one of the other sports, the "morris," which, being a procession, possessed with dances, had a tendency to absorb the characters of the others. A stop was put to the whole at the Reformation, when penalties were imposed by act of Parliament upon the performers.
Ritson, Child.

Diligent enquirers have been made to ascertain whether the personage known as Robin Hood had a real existence, but without positive results. The story of his life is purely legendary, and the theories in regard to him have never been advanced beyond hypothesis. It is even strongly probable that such a man lived in the 12th or 13th century, and that the exploits of other less prominent popular heroes were connected with his name and absorbed in his reputation. The noble descent which has often been ascribed to him is in all likelihood the result of the medieval idea that the great virtues of valor and loyalty are of gentle birth.
Tuckerman, Hist. of Prose Fiction, p. 48.

Hood, Samuel, first Viscount Hood. Born Dec. 12, 1724; died at Bath, England, Jan. 27, 1816. An English admiral. On Feb. 21, 1759, in command of the Vestal, he captured the French frigate Bellona after a fight of three hours. He was appointed commander-in-chief in North America, April, 1767, returning to England in 1771. In 1780 he became rear-admiral of the blue, and was sent to the West Indies to reinforce Rodney. He was sent to blockade Martinique in 1781, but was prevented from accomplishing his object by a French fleet under De Grasse. On Aug. 28, 1781, he joined Rear-Admiral Graves at New York. He commanded the rear at the battle with De Grasse, Sept. 5, 1781, but was not able to get into action. In Nov. he sailed to the West Indies, where he again met De Grasse. He was commander-in-chief in the Mediterranean in 1793, and took possession of the harbor and forts of Toulon in Aug.; from this position he was driven by the French in Dec. He captured Bastia May 19, 1794.

Hood, Thomas, Born at London, May 23, 1798; died there, May 3, 1845. An English poet and humorist. He began the study of engraving, but soon abandoned the art, and in 1821 became an under editor of the "London Magazine." In 1824 he began the "Comic Annual," and in 1843 "Hood's Magazine." From 1835 to 1837 he lived at Coblenz, and from 1837 to 1840 at Ostend. He wrote "Whims and Oddities" (1826), "Plea of the Midsummer Fairies, etc." (1827), "Tylney Hall," a novel (1834), "Dream of Eugene Aram" (1829), "Tylney Hall," a novel (1834), "Up the Rhine" (1841), "Song of the Shirt" (1843), "Bridge of Sighs," "Miss Kilmansegg," "Epistle to Rae Wilson," etc.

Hooft (hōft), Pieter Corneliszoon. Born at Amsterdam, March 16, 1581; died at The Hague, May 21, 1647. A Dutch poet and dramatist. He was the son of an Amsterdam burgomaster. He studied at Leyden, leaving in 1598, and subsequently in France, Italy, and Germany (1598–1601). In 1609 he was appointed bailiff of Muiden, and in the following years lived during the summer at the castle of Muiden, and in the winter at Amsterdam, in which places he gathered about him the most renowned artists, poets, and learned men of the day, since known in Dutch history as "the Muiden Circle." His lyric poems appeared for the first time collected in 1636. Among his dramas are particularly to be mentioned the pastoral play "Granida" (1616), the tragedies "Geeraerdt van Velsen" (1613), "Theseus en Ariadne" (1614), and "Baeto" (1626). His principal work is "Nederlandsche Historien" ("History of the Netherlands"), written during 1628–38, and published in 1642.

Hoog (hōg), Joost van der. Born about 1550: died after 1615. A Dutch captain who, in 1580, was the leader of the first Dutch colonists in Guiana. They settled on the Essequibo River, but were driven out by the Spaniards and Indians. Returning in greater force they formed the settlement of Demerara, of which Van der Hoog was the governor.

Horus (hō'rus), or Hor (hôr). In Egyptian mythology, a solar deity, the son of Osiris and Isis, and the avenger of his father upon Set: called by the Greeks Harpocrates. As Osiris was the sun of night, Horus was the sun of day. As the opponent of Set, he figured as the Elder Horus; as Horus the Child, he was the infant sun. He was usually represented as hawk-headed, and is hardly distinguishable from Ra, like whom he was the lord of Upper Egypt.

The heaven- or sun-god Horus was worshipped almost as generally as Ra. He was figured in various shapes in Egypt: as Harueri (the elder), Hapocrati (Harpokrates, the child), as the son of Isis of Set, or of Hathor, in many places in Upper Egypt as Khem, and in Lower Egypt. His symbol is the winged sun-disc, and he flies through the air as a hawk. His chief myth is that of the fight with Set. But it is difficult to trace his original form, as he is completely absorbed in the Osiris circle, to which he certainly did not originally belong.

Horus. A name given by Mariette to Hor-em-hib, an Egyptian king of the 18th dynasty.

After several insignificant kings came Horus, and with him the series of legitimate princes began again; but with him there was set in a violent reaction against the fanatical reforms of Amenophis IV. The names of the dethroned kings were everywhere chiselled out; their buildings were razed to the ground, and the capital at Tell-el-Amarna was so carefully and patiently demolished that not one stone is left standing.

Mariette, Outlines, p. 43.

Horváth (hôr'vät), Michael. Born at Szentes, Hungary, Oct. 20, 1809; died at Karlsbad, Bohemia, Aug. 19, 1878. A Hungarian historian and politician, minister of worship and public instruction in 1849. He wrote a "History of the Hungarians" (1861–66), "Historical Monuments of Hungary" (1857, etc.), "History of Hungary" (1859–63).

Hosea (hō-zē'ä), or Hoshea (hō-shē'ä). The first of the "minor prophets." He flourished in the kingdom of Israel under Jeroboam II. and his successors. In his prophecies, which consist of 14 chapters, he represents the relation of Israel to Yahveh (Jehovah) as that of a wife to her husband, and its apostasy as the faithlessness of a wife. In the first division (i.–iii.), which originated during the latter part of the reign of Jeroboam II., these ideas are symbolically expressed and illustrated by the prophet's own experiences in his married life with a faithless woman; the second division (iv.–xiv.), belonging to the period of the kings following, contains, on the basis of the same ideas, a series of discourses in which the sins of the people in all their aspects are severely censured. The style is characterized by short and abrupt, sometimes obscure, sentences, full of fervor and strong feeling.

Hoshangabad (hō-shung'gä-bäd), or Hushangabad (hu-shung'gä-bäd). 1. A district in the Central Provinces, British India, intersected by lat. 22° 30′ N., long. 77° 30′ E. Area, 4,437 square miles. Population (1881), 488,787.—2. The capital of the district of Hoshangabad, situated on the Nerbudda about lat. 22° 45′ N., long. 77° 37′ E. Population, about 15,000.

Hoshea (hō-shē'ä), or Hosea (hō-zē'ä). [Heb., 'deliverance,' 'salvation.'] The last king of the ten tribes, successor of Pekah son of Remaliah, whom he assassinated in a revolution, and whose throne he usurped. According to the annals of Tiglath-Pileser III., Pekah was killed by the Assyrian king, and Hoshea (Assyrian Ausi) was placed on his successor. The invasion by Tiglath-Pileser of the kingdom of Israel, resulting in the capture of many cities, the inhabitants of which were deported to Assyria, is mentioned in 2 Ki. xv. 29. Under Tiglath-Pileser's successor, Shalmaneser IV., Hoshea "conspired" against the Assyrians, seeking an alliance with the Egyptian king Shabaka (biblical So). This led to the destruction of Samaria after a three years' siege by Shalmaneser, and the imprisoning of its last king.

Hosius (hō'shi-us), or Osius (o'shi-us). Died in Spain about 358. A bishop of the early Christian church in Spain. He was appointed to the see of Cordova about 300, and in 324 was sent by Constantine the Great to Alexandria, with a view to composing the difficulties between Alexander and Arius. He is said by some to have drawn up the symbol of faith adopted at the Council of Nice in 325.

Hosius (hō'sē-ōs), Stanislaus. Born at Cracow, May 5, 1504; died near Rome, Aug. 5, 1579. A Polish cardinal, a leading opponent of Protestantism in Poland.

Hosmer (hos'mėr), Harriet G. Born at Watertown, Mass., Oct. 9, 1830. An American sculptor. She studied with Stevenson of Boston, and (anatomy) with Dr. Ellis and Dr. Dalton. In 1852–54 she went to Rome, and studied with Gibson. After 2 years she produced busts of "Daphne" and "Medusa." Among her best-known works are "Oenone" (1855), "Zenobia in Chains" (1859), "The Sleeping Faun" (1867), "The Waking Faun," "Beatrice Cenci," "Puck" (1885). The fountain in Central Park, New York, is by her.

Hospenthal (hos'pen-tāl). A place on the St. Gothard Pass, Switzerland, southwest of Andermatt.

Hospitalers of St. John of Jerusalem, Order of the. A body of military monks, which took its origin from an earlier community, not military in character, under whose auspices a hospital and a church had been founded in Jerusalem. Its military organization was perfected in the 12th century. After the recapture of Jerusalem by the Moslems the Knights defended Acre in vain, took shelter in Cyprus, and in the 14th century occupied the island of Rhodes. In 1522 the island of Rhodes was seized by the Turks, and the Knights, after some wanderings, had possession given them of Malta, the government of which island they administered until it was occupied by Napoleon in 1798. The Order of the Order has cross of 8 points, without any central disk, and consisting in fact of 4 barbed arrowheads meeting at their points—the well-known Maltese cross. The Knights of the Order were divided into 3 conferences for the different nations in which branches of the order have survived. At different times the order has been known as that of Knights of Rhodes and Knights of Malta. It maintains to the present day a certain independent existence; but until 1879 there was no grand master, and the order was governed by a council residing in Rome. The appointment of a new grand master in 1879 has produced some change in the constitution of the order. That branch of the order called the bailiwick of Brandenburg was established and organized as a separate order by the King of Prussia in 1852.

Hôtel de Cluny (ō-tel' dē klü-nē'). The palace, in Paris, of the Abbots of Cluny in Burgundy, built in the 15th and 16th centuries, and now a museum of medieval and Renaissance decorative art. It is a picturesque example of the late-Pointed style, with towers, square buildings, lofty roofs, high roofs, and tracery framed dormers. The little chapel is elaborately ornamented. The palace occupies the side of the Boulevard Saint-Germain and the Rue Cluny. Of this the baths survive in part, notably the vaulted frigidarium, 57 by 65 feet and 50 high, and decorated with frescos.

Hôtel de Rambouillet (dē roü-bō-yā'). A famous house in Paris, on the Rue St. Thomas du Louvre. It was destroyed together with the street when the Louvre was finished. It was originally the Hotel Pisani, the residence of the father of Madame Rambouillet. It was used as being the centre of Mesnard's Académie, a circle out of which afterward grew the French Academy. This salon was instituted about 1615 by the Marquise de Rambouillet, who shocked the taste of the fashionable society of the period. The women assumed the title of "les précieuses," and proposed to develop at the French language. The men called themselves "les précieux." They had a vocabulary of their own, and called all common things by uncommon names. They also had a conventional language out of which Somaise composed his "Dictionnaire des Précieuses." Richelieu, Corneille, Descartes, La Rochefoucauld, Balzac, Madame de Sevigné, and others were members of this coterie, and it exerted a good influence. Poetry and prose flourished, however, deteriorated, and the gatherings declined in interest and never recovered from the irony of Molière in "Les précieuses ridicules" and "Les femmes savantes," though it was only the extravagances of a few that he attacked. La Bruyère also took occasion to quarrel with them.

Hôtel des Invalides (ō-tel' dā zañ-vā-lēd'). A great establishment founded in 1670 at Paris for disabled and superannuated soldiers. The monumental façade, about 620 feet long, has 3 stories, and is adorned with military trophies and an equestrian statue of Louis XIV. The interior possesses halls adorned with interesting military paintings, and contains the Musée d'Artillerie, which includes a remarkable collection of medieval and Renaissance armor. The Church of the Invalides consists of 2 parts—the Eglise St. Louis and the Dôme, since 1840 the mausoleum of Napoleon I. The nave of the former is adorned with captured battle-flags. The Dôme was built by J. H. Mansart in 1706. Its plan it is a square of 108 feet, surmounted by a gilded dome on a circular drum which is 86 feet in diameter, and with its cross and lantern 344 high. The entrance is adorned with 2 tiers of classical columns and a pediment. The tomb of Napoleon is a large monolithic sarcophagus of red granite, placed beneath the dome in an open circular crypt 50 feet deep and 36 in diameter. The walls of the crypt bear allegorical reliefs and against its 12 piers stand colossal Victories. In alternate interpolumnations are placed 6 trophies, each of 10 flags taken in battle.

Hôtel de Ville (ō-tel' dē vēl). A historic building in Paris, of great size, burned by the Commune in 1871, but carefully restored and much enlarged. The original structure was begun in 1533 by an Italian, Domenico da Cortona; this is represented by the central part of the existing façade, which bothers a picturesque combination of the Italian and French Renaissance styles. It is of 2 stories, flanked by pavilions a story higher, all with high hip-roofs, and surmounted by a high open-work central tower. The exterior is adorned with much sculpture. The rooms of state display splendid sculptures and wall-paintings by the most distinguished contemporary artists.

Hotho (hō'tō). Heinrich Gustav. Born at Berlin, May 22, 1802; died there, Dec. 24, 1873. A German historian of art, appointed professor at the University of Berlin in 1829. He was director of the collection of prints in the Royal Museum from 1859. He wrote "Geschichte der deutschen und niederländischen Malerei" (1840–43), "Die Malerschule Ruberts van Eyck" (1855–58), "Geschichte der christlichen Malerei" (1867–72), etc.

Hottentot-Bushmen (hot'en-tot-bush'men). A South African race. Ethnically Iapsus includes the Hottentots, Bushmen, and Bushmen-Kaffirs, in the Kaffir, in the negro race, but he classes the Hottentot and Bushman languages with the Hamitic family. He derives the Hottentots from Ghadames in the Hamitic Tamahu negroes. Generally the Hottentots, Bushmen, and Pygmies are classed as one race or two separate races. There are striking differences between the Hottentots and the Bushmen in structure and language, but their physical and linguistic kinship seems to be well established. In the Bushmen the distinctive features of the Hottentots with regard to other races are considerably exaggerated. These peculiar features are (a) the color, that of the Bushmen being brown, that of the Hottentots yellow; (b) the stature, the Hottentots somewhat taller than the Bantu, while the Bushmen rank with the Pygmies; (c) the tufty hair; (d) the diminutive and broad nose; (e) the perpendicular fall of the lips; (f) the peculiar chin with prominent cheek-bones; (g) the wrinkled skin. Intellectually, the Hottentots and Bushmen are fairly gifted. By no people are the Bushmen more ill-treated than by their nearest of kin, the Hottentots. The Hottentots are pastoral: the Bushmen and Pygmies are exclusively given to hunting. The Hottentots are independent, even aggressive; the Bushmen and Pygmies are timid, and fewer, as Helots, on the skirts of the stronger Bantu settlements, which they supply with game. See Khoikhoin, Bushmen, and Africa (with subheadings).

Hottentots (hot'n-tots). [Native name Khoikhoin. Hottentot is supposed to be imitative of stammering, with ref. to the clicking sounds of Hottentot speech.] A nickname given by the first colonists to the natives of the Cape of Good Hope, because of the clicks and other strange sounds of their language. The Hottentots call themselves Khoikhoin, 'the men.' Sometimes Bushmen is used for the Bushmen and Pygmies as well, all these being considered as one race. In this acceptation the name Hottentot-Bushman (which see) is to be preferred.

Hottinger (hot'ing-ėr). Johann Heinrich. Born at Zurich, Switzerland, March 10, 1620; drowned in the river Limmat, near Zurich, June 5, 1667. A Swiss Orientalist and biblical scholar. He wrote "Thesaurus philologicus" (1644), "Etymologicum orientale" (1661), etc.

Houdin (ö-daṅ'), Jean Eugène Robert. Born at Blois, France, 1805; died there, June, 1871. A French conjurer and mechanician. He learned the trade of watch-making, but a friend-ship with a traveling juggler and a love of work on natural magic turned his attention to conjuring. He constructed the most complicated toys and automata, and in 1845 began a series of puzzling exhibitions. In 1856 he received the gold medal at Paris for an application of electricity to clocks. In 1856, at the request of the French government, he went to Algeria to "hoist with their own petard," if possible, the priests who were stirring up the people with their tricks In this he was successful. He published "Robert Houdin, etc" (1857), "Confidences" (1859), and "Les tricheries des Grecs devoilées" (1861), exposing gambling cheats.

Houdon (ö-dôñ'), Jean Antoine. Born at Versailles, France, about 1741; died at Paris, July 16, 1828. A noted French sculptor. He won the prix de Rome at the age of nineteen, and remained in Italy 10 years, during the period of Winckelmann and the excavations at Pompeii and Herculaneum. While in Rome he made the famous statue of St. Bruno at Sainte-Marie-des-Anges. On his return to France he exhibited in the Salon of 1771 a statuette of Morphee, which gained him entrance to the Academy, and soon after he made his famous "Ecorche," reduced copies of which are well known in the drawing schools. He visited America with Franklin, and resided with Washington at Philadelphia, where he modeled a bust from which he afterward made his Richmond statue. In 1778 he made busts of Catharine of Russia and of Diderot, and in 1775 busts of Turgot and Gluck, and a statue of Sophie Arnould as Iphigenia. In the Salon of 1781 he offered his nude statue of Diana (which was excluded), the statue of Tourville, and the famous Voltaire of the Theatre Français. He also made busts of Molière, Rousseau, Franklin, and D'Alembert. His bust of Buffon is perhaps his finest work. In the Revolution he was denounced at the tribunal of the Convention for having a statue of a saint in his atelier, and escaped through the presence of mind of a manmaker who declared that the work was a statue of Philosophy.

Howard, George William Frederick, seventh Earl of Carlisle; earlier Viscount Morpeth. Born at London, April 18, 1802; died at Castle Howard, Yorkshire, England, Dec. 5, 1864. An English statesman. He was chief secretary for Ireland 1835–41; chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster 1850–52; and viceroy of Ireland 1855–58 and 1859–64. He wrote "Diary in Turkish and Greek Waters" (1854), and other works in prose and verse.

Howard, Henry, Earl of Surrey. Born about 1517; beheaded on Tower Hill, London, Jan. 21, 1547. An English poet. He was known in youth as "Henry Howard of Kenninghall," from an estate owned by his grandfather in Norfolk. He received an unusually good education, and from 1539–42 lived at Windsor with the young Duke of Richmond, the natural son of Henry VIII., accompanying the king to France in 1532. He remained at the French court for about a year. In 1541 he was installed Knight of the Garter, and in 1543 joined the English forces at Landrecies with special recommendations from Henry VIII. to Charles V., and a little later was appointed captain-general of the English forces at the siege of Boulogne, of which he was made governor in 1545, but was recalled to England the next year. Henry VIII. was ill, and, when his death was near, Surrey's father, the Duke of Norfolk, who was a premier duke, was instrumental in aiming at the throne. A month before the king's death both were arrested, and the Duke of Norfolk, as peer of the realm, was tried by his peers. The Earl of Surrey, however, who had only a courtesy title, was tried by a jury picked for the occasion, who found that he "falsely, maliciously, and traitorously set upon his bosom the arms of Edward the Confessor, then used by the Prince of Wales, mixed up and joined with his own proper arms." He had borne these arms without question in the presence of the king, as the rewards before him had done since their grant by Richard II. He was tried for high treason and beheaded. His poems were first printed as "Songs and Sonetes" in "Tottel's Miscellany" in 1557, with those of Sir Thomas Wyatt. He was the first English writer of blank verse, translating the second and fourth books of the Æneid into this form, and with Wyatt he introduced the sonnet into English literature.

Howard, John. Born probably at Hackney, London, Sept. 2, 1726; died at Kherson, Russia, Jan. 20, 1790. An English philanthropist, celebrated for his exertions in behalf of prison reform. He was appointed high sheriff of Bedfordshire in 1773, and the acquaintance with prison abuses which he gained in the office led to his career as a reformer. After a careful personal inspection of the prisons of England, Scotland, and Ireland, he visited those of Paris, Holland, Flanders, Germany, and Switzerland, and later made a second tour in England. He published "The State of the Prisons in England and Wales, etc." (1777). He made other continental tours of inspection in 1778, 1781, 1783, and 1785, during the last of which he inspected the condition of the lazarettos. His last journey was begun in 1789, when he went to Russia for the purpose of examining the military hospitals. While engaged in this work he was attacked by camp-fever and died. He was buried at Dophinovka. His labors led to many important reforms.

Howard, John Eager. Born in Baltimore County, Md., June 4, 1752; died at Baltimore, Oct. 12, 1827. An American Revolutionary officer and politician. He served at the Cowpens in 1781, and was governor of Maryland 1789–92 and United States senator 1796–1803.

He commanded a brigade at the battles of Bull Run and Fair Oaks, a division at the battles of Antietam and Fredericksburg, and an army corps at Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Missionary Ridge, and Chattanooga, and led the right wing of Sherman's army in the march from Atlanta to the sea. He was chief of the Freedmen's Bureau 1865–74, and was promoted major-general in 1886.

Howard, Thomas, Earl of Surrey and second Duke of Norfolk. Born in 1443; died May 21, 1524. An English soldier and politician. He defeated the Scots at Flodden Field, Sept. 9, 1513.

Howard, Thomas, Earl of Surrey and third Duke of Norfolk. Born in 1473; died at Kenninghall, Aug. 25, 1554. An English soldier and politician. He became lord high treasurer in 1522, and, on the marriage of his niece Catharine Howard to Henry VIII. in 1540, gained great influence at court. Through the influence of his rival the Earl of Hertford, he was ordered to execution on the charge of treason in 1547, but was saved by the death of Henry VIII.

Howard, Thomas, fourth Duke of Norfolk. Born March 10, 1536; died June 2, 1572. An English politician, son of Henry Howard, earl of Surrey. He was the first subject in England under Elizabeth, inasmuch as there were no princes of the blood and he was the possessor of the highest title. In 1569 he was appointed lieutenant of the northern counties in 1536. He aspired to become the husband of Mary Queen of Scots, and joined a conspiracy for her liberation in consequence of which he was executed on the charge of treason.

Howard, Thomas, Earl of Arundel. Born July 7, 1592; died at Padua, Italy, Oct. 4, 1646. An English nobleman. He was employed in various diplomatic missions; and formed the first large collection of works of art in England, part of which he presented to the University of Oxford by his grandson under the name of the Arundelian marbles.

They were subordinate to the Chancas until both tribes were conquered by the Inca Pachacutec Yupanqui, about 1430. Their descendants are now merged in the general population of Peru.

Huancavelica (wän-kä-vä-lē'kä). 1. A department of central Peru. Area, 10,814 square miles. Population, about 100,000.—2. The capital of the department of Huancavelica, situated about 150 miles southeast of Lima. It was formerly one of the richest cities in Peru, and was noted for its quicksilver mines, now abandoned. Population, about 5,000.

Huancavillcas (wän-kä-vēl'käs). A powerful tribe of Indians, presumably of Quichua stock, who formerly inhabited the lowlands of eastern Ecuador, between the river Daule and the sea, and the valleys near the Huallaga appear to have been under Inca domination, occupied the same region at the time of the Spanish conquest. Their descendants are merged in the general population of the Guayaquil valley.

Huancayo (wän-kä'yō). A city of Peru, in the southwestern part of the department of Junin, in the valley of Jauja, 10,880 feet above the sea. It gave its name to the constitution promulgated there Nov. 10, 1839, which was finally superseded by that of Nov. 18, 1860. Population, about 5,000.

Huanta (wän'tä). A town in the department of Ayacucho, Peru, about 200 miles southeast of Lima. Population, about 4,000.

Huánuco (wä'nō-kō), or Guánuco (gwä'nō-kō). 1. A central department of Peru, comprehending part of the upper valley of the Huallaga with the adjacent mountains. The mountains are rich in minerals, and the valleys near the Huallaga are covered with forest. Huanuco corresponds to an Inca province or region of the same name. It was settled by Gomez de Alvarado in 1539. Area, 25,000 square miles. Population, about 50,000.

Huaraca (wä-rä'kä). A great festival of the ancient Peruvians, held at the time of the summer solstice. The youths who had attained sufficient age and strength were then admitted to military rank, with various ceremonies and tests of endurance.

Huaraz (wä-räth'). The capital of the department of Aneachs, Peru, situated on the river Santa about 200 miles north by west of Lima. Population, about 17,000.

Huarina (wä-rē'nä). A plain at the southwestern extremity of Lake Titicaca, in Peru. It gave its name to the battle of Oct. 26, 1547, in which Gonzalo Pizarro and his lieutenant Carvajal defeated Diego Centeno.

Huascar (wäs'kär), or Inti Cusi Hualpa (ēn'tē kō'sē wäl'pä). Born about 1495 (according to Cieza de Leon, in 1500): died at Andamarca, Jan., 1533. An Inca chief. At the death of his father, Huaina Capac (Nov., 1525), the empire was divided between Huascar and his illegitimate brother, Atahualpa. Huascar had the southern and larger part, with his capital at Cuzco. War broke out between the two, and Huascar was eventually defeated and captured (1532). After Atahualpa was seized by Pizarro he feared that the Spaniards would interfere in favor of his brother, and by his secret orders Huascar was drowned.

Huastecs (wäs'teks). A tribe of Indians near the coast of eastern Mexico, in southern Tamaulipas and northern Vera Cruz. By their language they are allied to the Mayas of Yucatan, and those ethnologists who hold that the Mayas came from the north believe that the Huastecs were a tribe left behind during their migration. At the time of the conquest they lived in villages, generally of wooden houses, and practised agriculture. They readily submitted to the whites, and have long been Christianized. Also written Huasteca, Huaxteca, and Guasteca.

Hudibras (hū'di-bras). A satirical poem by Samuel Butler, directed against the Puritans, published in 1663: so called from the name of its hero, who is a Presbyterian country justice. Accompanied by a clerk, one of the Independents, he ranges the country after the manner of Don Quixote, with zealous ignorance endeavoring to correct abuses and repress superstition.

The greatest single production of wit of this period, I might say of this country, is Butler's "Hudibras." It contains specimens of every variety of drollery and satire, and those specimens crowded together into almost every page. The proof of this is that nearly one-half of his lines are got by heart, and quoted for mottoes.

Hudibras, Sir. A rash and melancholy man in Spenser's "Faerie Queene." It is thought that the poet intended to shadow forth the Puritans in this character. See Hudibras.

Hudson (hud'son). (Named from Henry Hudson, who discovered it in 1609.) A river in New York, arising in the Adirondacks in Essex County, New York, flowing south, and falling into New York Bay in lat. 40° 42′ N., long. 74° 1′ W. It is celebrated for its picturesque scenery, especially in its course through the Highlands and past the Palisades. In its lower course it is called the North River. The Mohawk is its chief tributary. Length, about 350 miles; navigable to Troy, 151 miles. On its banks are Troy, Albany, Kingston, Poughkeepsie, Newburg, Fishkill, Cornwall, West Point, Sing Sing, Yonkers, New York, and Jersey City.

Hudson. A city, river port, and the capital of Columbia County, New York, situated on the east bank of the Hudson, 28 miles south of Albany. Population (1890), 9,970.

Hudson, George. Born at York, England, 1800; died at London, Dec. 14, 1871. An English speculator, known as "the railway king."

Hudson, Henry. Died in Hudson Bay (?), 1611. A noted English navigator. He was, perhaps, grandson of Henry Hudson, one of the founders of the Muscovy Company in 1555. In 1607 he was sent out by that company, in the Hopeful, to sail across the pole to the Spice Islands. He reached the east coast of Greenland (lat. 69–70°) in June; sailed northward along the coast to lat. 73°; there went along the ice-barrier to Spitzbergen, reaching 80° 23′; and returned to England, discovering Jan Mayen (named by him Hudson's Touches) on the way. In 1608 he attempted to find a northeast passage. On March 25, 1609, he set sail with the Good Hope and Half Moon, in the service of the Dutch East India Company, with the same object; but his crews mutinied, the Good Hope returned, and with the Half Moon he sailed across the Atlantic to Nova Scotia. Thence he sailed southward, exploring the coast as far as Chesapeake Bay. In Sept. he explored the river afterward named for him, ascending it nearly to the site of Albany. In 1610 he sailed in the Discovery to find a northwest passage, and entered Hudson Strait and Hudson Bay. He wintered on James Bay. On his return his crew mutinied, and on June 22, 1611, he was bound and set adrift, with seven others, in a small boat on Hudson Bay. They were never seen again.

Hudson, Henry Norman. Born at Cornwall, Vt., Jan. 28, 1814; died at Cambridge, Mass., Jan. 16, 1886. An American Shakspearian scholar and Episcopal clergyman. He published "Lectures on Shakspere" (1848), "Shakspere: His Life, Art, and Characters, etc." (1872), "Studies in Wordsworth" (1874), "Essays on Education, etc." (1880). He edited Shakspere (11 vols.) in Ticknor's series (1870–1880).

Hudson, Sir Jeffery or Geoffrey. Born at Oakham, Rutlandshire, England, 1619; died in 1682. A famous English dwarf. He was but 18 or 20 inches high till he was about 30 years of age, when he grew to the height of 3 feet 9 inches. He made his first appearance served up in a pie at the table of the Duke of Buckingham. After the marriage of Charles I. he was a page in the service of the queen. He had many adventures; was a captain in the royal army at the beginning of the civil war; and had his portrait painted by Vandyck. Scott introduces him in "Peveril of the Peak." He was finally arrested in 1682 upon some suspicion connected with the Popish plot, and confined in the Gatehouse prison. He was released, and did not die there as Scott and others state. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Hudson Bay. An inland sea in North America, inclosed by British America on the east, south, and west, and partly inclosed by Southampton Island on the north: called James Bay in the south. It communicates with the Atlantic through Hudson Strait, and with the Arctic Ocean through Fox Channel. Its chief tributaries are the Churchill and Nelson. It was explored by Henry Hudson in 1610. Length, about 1,000 miles. Greatest width, about 600 miles.

Hugh Capet (hü kā'pet; F. pron. ügz kā-pā'). Died Oct. 24, 996. King of France 987–996, son of Hugh the Great whom he succeeded in the duchy of France and in the countship of Paris in 956. He was elected king on the extinction of the direct line of Charles the Great by the death of Louis le Fainéant without issue in 987. He found the royal domain restricted to the region bounded by the Somme, the Loire, Normandy, Auxois, and Champagne; and was powerless to resist the great feudatories — the dukes of Normandy, Brittany, Burgundy, and Aquitaine, and the counts of Flanders, Champagne, and Toulouse — each of whom surpassed the king in military power and in extent of territory. He became the founder of the Capetian dynasty.

Hughenden (hu'en-den). A village in Buckinghamshire, England, 31 miles west-northwest of London. Hughenden Manor was the seat of the Earl of Beaconsfield.

Hughes (hüz). John. Born in County Tyrone, Ireland, June 24, 1797; died at New York, Jan. 3, 1864. A Roman Catholic prelate. He became bishop of New York in 1842, and archbishop in 1850. He founded St. John's College, Fordham, in 1838.

Hughes, Thomas. Born near Newbury, Berkshire, England, Oct. 23, 1823. An English author, reformer, and politician. He was educated at Rugby under Dr. Arnold, and was later associated with Canon Kingsley and F. D. Maurice in the movement for improving the conditions of the poor known as "Christian Socialism. He lectured in the United States in 1870, and in 1880 he founded the "Rugby Colony" in Tennessee. He was made queen's counsel in 1869, and county court judge in 1882. (See Rowley.) He has written "Tom Brown's School Days" (1856), "The Scouring of the White Horse" (1858), "Tom Brown at Oxford" (1861), "The Manliness of Christ" (1879), "Rugby, Tennessee" (1881), etc.

Hugo (hü'gō; F. pron. ü-gō'), Victor Marie. Born at Besançon, Feb. 26, 1802; died at Paris, May 22, 1885. A celebrated French poet, the recognized leader of the romantic school of the 19th century in France. His childhood was spent partly with his mother in Paris, and partly in Corsica, Elba, Italy, and Spain — wherever his father, an officer in the French army, could gather his family about him. He received his early education at home, and at a class with the hands of an old priest, Lauvière. In 1815 he went to school, and thence to the Lycée Louis-le-Grand in Paris. In 1816 he wrote his first verses, "Le Vœu de Louis," and all at school he began another tragedy "Athélie," and composed a melodrama "Inez de Castro," and several poems. He also competed for a prize of the French academy with a poem, "Sur les avantages de l'étude" (1817). Again, in 1818, he competed with his poems "Sur l'institution du jury" and "Sur les avantages de l'enseignement mutuel." His successes encouraged him to send to the Academy of Floral Games at Toulouse "Les derniers bardes," "Les vierges de Verdun," and "Le rétablissement de la statue de Henri IV." (1819), for which he was awarded the golden violet. In 1820 he took another prize with his poem "Moise sur le Nil, and was made maître ès jeux-floraux. In 1819 he had founded a fortnightly review, "Le Conservateur Littéraire"; he wrote also for "La Muse Française." His poetical compositions include "Odes et poésies diverses" (1822), "Nouvelles odes" (1824), "Odes et ballades" (1826), of which a revised and enlarged edition appeared in 1828; "Les orientales" (1829), "Les feuilles d'automne" (1831), "Les chants du crépuscule" (1835), "Les voix intérieures" (1837), "Les rayons et les ombres" (1840), "Les châtiments" (1853), "Les contemplations" (1856), "La légende des siècles" (1859), "Les chansons des rues et des bois" (1865), "L'Année terrible" (1872), "L'Art d'être grand-père (1877), second series of "La légende des siècles" (1877), "Le pape" (1878), "La pitié suprême" (1879), "L'Ane" (1880), "Religions et religion" (1880), "Les quatre vents de l'esprit" (1881), third series of "La légende des siècles" (1883), "La fin de satan" (1886), "Dieu" (1891), "Toute la lyre" (1888–93). As a dramatist Victor Hugo adapted "Amy Robsart" (1829) from Scott's "Kenilworth" and also wrote "Cromwell" (1827), "Marion Delorme" (1829), "Hernani" (1830), "Le roi s'amuse" (1832), "Lucrèce Borgia" (1833), "Marie Tudor" (1833), "Angelo" (1835), "Esmeralda" (1836), "Ruy Blas" (1838), "Les Burgraves" (1843), "Torquemada" (1882). "Le théâtre en liberté" (1886), and "Les jumeaux" (1889). Victor Hugo's prose writings are "Han d'Islande" (1823), "Bug-Jargal" (1826), "Le dernier jour d'un condamné" (1829), "Notre Dame de Paris" (1831), "Littérature et philosophie mêlées" and "Claude Gueux" (1834), "Le Rhin" (1842), "Napoléon le petit" (1852), "Les misérables" (1862), "Victor Hugo raconté par un témoin de sa vie" (1863), "William Shakespeare" (1864), "Les travailleurs de la mer" (1866), "L'Homme qui rit" (1869), "Actes et paroles" (1872–76), "Quatrevingt-treize" (1874), "Histoire d'un crime" (1877–78), "Choses vues" (1887), "Un voyage: Alpes et Pyrénées" (1890). He was elected to the French Academy Jan. 7, 1841. His interest in politics and journalism led him to found a newspaper, "L'Événement," in 1848. After the revolution of the same year he was exiled from France not to return till the fall of the empire in 1870. He went first to Brussels, in 1851, and thence to Jersey. In 1870 Victor Hugo was elected a life member of the French senate in 1876, and the last years of his life were devoted to literary work.

Huguenots (hū'ge-nots). [The name as applied to the Protestants of France was first used about 1560, being apparently imported from Geneva, where it appears to have been for some time in use as a political nickname. Its particular origin is unknown; no contemporary information has been found.] The Reformed or Calvinistic communion established in France in the 16th and 17th centuries. The Huguenots were the Puritans of France, noted in general for their austere virtues and the singular purity of their lives. They were persecuted in the reign of Francis I. and his immediate successors, and after 1562 were frequently at war with the Catholics, under the lead of such men as Admiral Coligny and the King of Navarre (afterward Henry IV. of France). In religious wars and massacres, notably that of St. Bartholomew (Aug. 24, 1572), they continued numerous and powerful, and the Edict of Nantes issued by Henry IV. (1598), secured to them full political and civil rights. Their political power was broken after the surrender of La Rochelle in 1628, and the revocation of the Edict of Nantes by Louis XIV. (1685) caused the most severe persecutions, forced hundreds of thousands into exile to Prussia, the Netherlands, Switzerland, England, etc. Many settled in the colonies of New York, Virginia, etc., but especially in South Carolina. The name is now applied in general to the present day to the descendants of the original Huguenots.

Huguenots, Les. An opera by Meyerbeer, first produced at Paris in 1836.

Hugues (üg), Victor. Born at Marseilles, 1761; died near Bandeau, Nov., 1826. A French administrator. He went to Santo Domingo in 1778, was engaged in the revolution of 1789, and was deported to France. The Convention made him commissioner to the French West Indies (1794), where by severe measures he soon began to look St. Lucia and other islands from the English. In his government of Guadeloupe he showed extreme cruelty to those opposed to revolutionary ideas. He fitted out several privateers which preyed not only on the English, but on North American commerce, nearly provoking a war between the United States and France (1798). Recalled in Dec., 1798, he was made captain-general (Nov. 1799), finally surrendering to the English Jan. 12, 1809. He was again governor of Cayenne 1817–19.

Huilliches (wēl-yē-chās). [Araucanian: huilli, southern, and che, people.] The name given to various hordes of Indians of the Araucanian stock who inhabit that portion of Chile near the Gulf of Ancud. See Araucanians.

Huitzilihuitl (wet-zē-lē'wētl). [Nahuatl, 'humming-bird.'] Died in 1414. An Aztec sovereign of Tenochtitlan (Mexico) from 1403. He was a son of Acamapichtli, and married a daughter of Tezozomoc chitlan, thus strengthening the alliance between the two tribes. It was under a regular system of laws was first established during his reign.

Huitzilopochtli (wēt-zē-lō-spōch'tlē). The war-god and principal deity of the ancient Mexicans: "the mythic leader and chief deity of the Aztecs, dominant tribe of the Nahua nation" (Bancroft). He was represented by a hideous stone idol, believed by Bandelier and others to be the one now preserved in the museum at Mexico. As he was supposed to be of a very sanguinary disposition, immense numbers of human sacrifices were made before the idol. When his great temple was dedicated, in 1486, it is stated that 70,000 victims (evidently an exaggeration) were slain. It appears that he was also called Mexitli (whence the name Mexico, given to Tenochtitlan).

Hulin, or Hullin (ü-laṅ'), Comte Pierre Augustin. Born at Paris, Sept. 6, 1758; died at Paris, Jan. 9, 1841. A French general in the Napoleonic wars. He became adjutant-general to Bonaparte in 1796, and general of division in 1802. He presided at the court-martial which condemned the Duc d'Enghien in 1804, and in 1812, when governor of Paris, put down the conspiracy of Malet to subvert the empire.

It lies between Yorkshire on the north and Lincolnshire on the south. Length, about 40 miles. The chief ports are Hull and Grimsby. It was the boundary of ancient Northumbria (Deira) and Mercia, and a thoroughfare for Norse incursions.

Humbert (hum'bėrt), It. Umberto (öm-ber'tō), I., Ranieri Carlo Emanuele Giovanni Maria Ferdinando Eugenio. Born at Turin, March 14, 1844. Son of Victor Emanuel and Maria Adelaide, whom he succeeded in 1878. He commanded, while Prince of Piedmont, a division of General Cialdini's army at Custozza June 23, 1866. The most notable event of his reign is the formation of the Triple Alliance (1882).

Humboldt (hum'bōlt; G. pron. höm'bōlt), Baron Friedrich Heinrich Alexander von. Born at Berlin, Sept. 14, 1769: died there, May 6, 1859. A celebrated German scientist and author. He studied at the universities of Frankfort-on-the-Oder and Gottingen, and afterward in Holland, Belgium, and England continued his studies at the mining school in Freiberg. From 1792 he was for several years mining engineer at Steben, near Bayreuth, but resigned the position in 1797 and left for England, Italy and Switzerland. In 1799 he became acquainted with Aime Bonpland, with whom he undertook from 1799 to 1804 a scientific journey to South America and Mexico. From 1829 to 1827 he lived for the most part in Paris, engaged in scientific work. After 1827 he took up his permanent residence in Berlin. In 1829, at the instance of the Emperor of Russia, he undertook, in another scientific expedition, to Siberia and the Caspian Sea. Subsequently until his death, he lived in Berlin. The results of the American journey were published in a large series of works with the general title "Voyage aux regions equinoxiales du nouveau continent." They include "Relation historique" (1811–29, covering only the first part of the trip), "Essai politique sur le Nouvelle Espagne" (1811), "Essai politique sur l'isle de Cuba" (1826–27), scientific monographs, atlases, etc. The "Asie Centrale" and other works describe the Asiatic journey. The "Examen critique de l'histoire de la geographie du nouveau continent, etc.," a work showing great research, was published 1834–38, and "Kosmos" 1845–58. The latter, perhaps the greatest of Humboldt's books, was first published in German.

Humboldt, Baron Friedrich Wilhelm Christian Karl Fernand von, commonly known as Wilhelm von Humboldt. Born at Potsdam, Prussia, June 22, 1767: died at Tegel, near Berlin, April 8, 1835. A German philologist and author. He studied jurisprudence at Frankfort-on-the-Oder and Gottingen. He afterward traveled extensively through Europe, and acquired a mastery of the principal modern languages. From 1801 to 1808 he was Prussian minister resident in Rome. The latter year he returned to Berlin, where, as minister of public instruction he was active in the foundation of the new University of Berlin. Afterward he was minister resident in Vienna and a member of the Vienna Congress. Later he was minister resident in London, and, finally, minister of the interior in Berlin. After 1819 he lived to the most part at Tegel. His principal work, "Ueber die Verschiedenheit des menschlichen Sprachbaues und ihren Einfluss auf die geistige Entwickelung des Menschengeschlechts" ("On the Difference in the Construction of Language, and its Influence upon the Intellectual Development of the Human Race"), has been published several times separately. "Briefe an eine Freundin" ("Letters to a Friend," Charlotte Diede) appeared first in 1847. His collected works were published at Berlin, 1841–52, in 7 vols.

A celebrated German pianist and composer for the pianoforte, author of concertos, sonatas, operas (3), etc. He was a pupil of Mozart, kapellmeister to Prince Esterhazy 1804–11, conductor at Stuttgart 1816, and later (1820) conductor at Weimar.

Hummums, The. See the extract.

> In the southeast corner of the market-place (Covent Garden), and occupying that portion which was destroyed by fire, are two hotels, known by the strange names of the "Old Hummums" and the "New Hummums." The name is a corruption of "Humsum." Mr. Wright, in his "History of Domestic Manners of England," says: "Among the customs introduced from the East was that of sweating bath which, under the name of the hothouse, became widely known in England. . . . These "Hummums," however, when established in London, seem to have been mostly frequented by women of doubtful repute. . . . They soon came to be used for the purpose of intrigue, which gradually led to their suppression.

He studied at Balliol College, Oxford, and was noted as a patron of learning and a collector of books. He was the founder, by his gifts of books, of the library of that university. In 1420 he was appointed lieutenant of England, and held that office until the return of Henry V. in 1422. On Henry's death Gloucester, though only deputy for Bedford, became practically protector of the young king Henry VI., through Bedford's occupation with affairs in France. In 1422 he married Jacqueline, only daughter of William I., count of Hainault, to whose estates she had succeeded, but of which she had been deprived; and in 1424 conquered Hainault and was proclaimed its count. In 1428 his marriage with Jacqueline was annulled, and he soon married his mistress, Eleanor Cobham. His protectorate, which was throughout unfortunate, was terminated by the coronation of Henry VI., Nov. 6, 1429. In 1441 he was disgraced through the dealings of his wife with the astrologer Bolingbroke. (See Cobham, Eleanor.) In 1447 he was arrested by order of the king, and in a few days died.

The Hungary proper—that is, the main portion of the Transleithan division, less Transylvania. See Transylvania. In this sense, Hungary is bounded by Moravia (separated by the Carpathians on the north and by Austria separated by the Carpathians on the northwest, by Galicia (separated by the Carpathians on the north and northeast, Bukowina and Transylvania on the east, Servia (separated by the Danube) and Croatia-Slavonia (separated by the Drave) on the south, and Styria and Lower Austria (separated by the Leithaand Mur) on the west. The Carpathians are in the north and east; the Bakony Wald and spurs of the Alps are west of the Danube. The leading physical features are the great plains of the Danube and Theiss. The country produces large quantities of wheat, barley, rye, Indian corn, wine; the mineral products are coal, iron, lead, copper, silver, gold, etc. The export are wheat, flour, barley, live stock, etc. Including Transylvania, Hungary has 63 counties. The capital and principal city is Budapest. The dominant people in Hungary proper are the Magyars. Hungary proper was included in the ancient Pannonia and Dacia. The settlement of the Magyars under Arpad in the ninth century, their subsequent attacks on neighboring lands, and were defeated by Henry the Fowler and by Otto the Great on the Lechfeld (955). Hungary was Christianized in the end of the fifth century, and became a kingdom under St. Stephen in 1000. During the next two centuries it increased its territories at the expense of the Slavs. The constitution of the "Golden Bull" was granted in 1222. The country was overrun and ravaged by the Mongols in 1241. The Arpad dynasty came to an end in 1301, and was followed by the House of Anjou (1305), under which the country became a commanding European nation. Louis united the crowns of Hungary and Poland 1370–82; and they were again united under Ladislaus, who died in 1444. War against the Turks was carried on under the leadership of John Hunyadi and Matthias Corvinus reigned 1458–90. The crowns of Hungary and Bohemia were united 1490–1526. On the overthrow of the Hungarians by the Turks at the battle of Mohacs, 1526, a large part of Hungary passed to the Turks, and Ferdinand of the Hapsburgs (later emperor) became king of the remainder with Zapolya as rival king. Buda was conquered from the Turks in 1686. The sovereignty was made hereditary in the Hapsburg family in 1687; and Hungary was ceded by the Turks in 1699 and 1718. An eight years' rebellion was suppressed 1711. The abolition of 1848–49, under the leadership of Kossuth and others, was suppressed with Russian assistance. The dualistic system of government was established under Francis Joseph by the Ausgleich in 1867. Area of proper, 91,500 square miles. Population (1890), 12,995,410.

Huns (hunz). [LL. Hunni, Lgr. Ounnoi, also LL. Chunni, Chuni, Lgr. Xounnoi, Xounnoi; doubtfully identified with the Chinese Hiungnu or Hoangnoo, a people who, according to Chinese annals, constituted about the end of the 3d century B. C. a powerful empire in central Asia.] A Mongolian race which, having crossed the Volga about 350 and totally defeated the Alani, united with them and then attacked the Goths, thus compelling the irruption of the Goths into the Roman Empire about 375. The Huns, with various subject tribes, invaded Gaul under the leadership of Attila, and were defeated near Chalons-sur-Marne in 451. (See Attila, etc.) The date of the Huns is uncertain. They were probably merged in the later invaders.

But for one somewhat disputed source of information, all is dark concerning them. That source is the history of China. If the Huns be the Hoang-nu, whose ravages are recorded in that history, then we have a minute account of their doings for centuries before the Christian era, and we know, in fact, far more about them than about the inhabitants of Gaul or Britain before the time of Julius Cæsar: if they are not, our ignorance is complete. A learned and laborious Frenchman, M. Deguignes, in the middle of last century, conceived the idea that the Huns might be thus identified, and with minute pains has written out their history from Chinese sources, and has elaborated it in close connection with that of the various Tartar conquerors, who, since then day, have poured down upon the civilised kingdoms of Europe and Asia and wasted them. Bodichon, Britain and her Invaders, II. 3.

Huns, White, or Ephthalites. An ancient people in central Asia, near the Oxus. They were so called by the Greeks on account of their civilization. It is supposed that they became established in the region after the great emigration of the Huns. They were finally blended with the Turks.

Hunyady (hön'yod-i), János. Born at Hunyad, Transylvania, 1387; died at Semlin, Croatia-Slavonia, Aug. 11, 1456. A Hungarian general. He became voivode of Transylvania in 1442, and was chosen regent of Hungary on the death of Ladislaus I. of Poland at the battle of Varna in 1444. His most celebrated exploit was his successful defense of Belgrad against the Turks under Mohammed II. in 1456.

Hunyady was the name the Christians conferred with. When King Sigismund of Hungary was flying from one of his numerous engagements with the Ottoman armies, he met and loved the beautiful Elizabeth Morsinay, at the village of Hunyade, and John Hunyady was believed to be the fruit of this consolatory affection. "Whatsoever his parents were," says Knolles, "he himself was a politic valiant, fortunate, and famous captain, his victories so great as that like was never before any Christian prince obtained against the Turks; so that his name became unto them so dreadful that they used the same to fear their crying children withal." Pode, Story of Turkey, p. 87.

Huon de Bordeaux (ü-ôn' dē bor-dō'). A French chanson de geste. It supplied Shakspere with some of the dramatis personæ of "A Midsummer Night's Dream."

Huon de Bordeaux, though written in verse as far back as the fourteenth century, is not in its present form supposed to be long anterior to the invention of printing, as there are no manuscripts of it extant. It is said, indeed, at the end of the work, that it was written by the desire of Charles Seigneur de Rochefort, and completed on the 20th of January, 1454; but it is suspected that the conclusion is of a date somewhat more recent than the first part of the romance. The oldest edition is one in folio, without date and the second is in quarto, 1516. There are also different impressions, in the original language, of a more recent period. Huon of Bordeaux, indeed, seems to have been a favourite romance not only among the French, but also with other nations. The English translation, executed by Lord Berners in the reign of Henry VIII., has gone through three editions, and it has lately formed the subject of the finest poem in the German language. . . . The incidents in the Oberon of Wieland are nearly the same with those in the old French romance, and are universally known through the . . . translation of Mr. Sotheby.

Martin) (1875–76), "Hume: with Helps to the Study of Berkeley" (1879), "Essays upon some Controverted Questions" (1892), "Evolution and Ethics" (1893).

Huy (hoi), Flem. Hoey. A town in the province of Liège, Belgium, situated at the confluence of the Hoyoux with the Meuse, 17 miles west-southwest of Liège: the medieval Hoium. It has a citadel. The Church of Notre Dame is noteworthy. Population (1890), 14,486.

Huygens, less correctly Huyghens (hi'genz; D. pron. hoi'ĕens), Christian. Born at The Hague, April 14, 1629; died there, June 8, 1695, celebrated Dutch physicist, astronomer, and mathematician, son of Constantijn Huygens. He discovered a satellite of Saturn in 1655, and the ring of saturn in 1659; invented the pendulum clock in 1656. Improved the telescope, and unveiled the wave-theory of light. He wrote "Horologium Oscillatorium" (1673).

Huygens, or Huyghens, Constantijn: L. Hugenius. Born at The Hague, Sept. 4, 1596; died at his estate, Hofwijk, March 28, 1687. A Dutch poet, father of Christian Huygens. He was the son of a state secretary. He studied at Leyden, and subsequently at Breda, in various classics; fled to England, then to Venice, and afterward twice again to England, where he was knighted in 1622. In 1625 he succeeded to his father's position. His collected poems appeared for the first time in 1625, under the title "Otia, of Leidighe Tren ("Otia, or Idle Hours"). Later amplified as "Koninclijcke Uytspanningh" ("Royal Recreation") in 37 books. His later poems, "Cluyswerk" ("Cell-Work"), were published in 1841.

Huysum (hoi'sum), Jan van. Born at Amsterdam, April 15, 1682; died there, 1749. A noted Dutch painter of flowers and fruit: in this department the ablest painter of the 18th century.

Hwangho (hwang'hō), or Hoangho, or the Yellow River. The northernmost of the two chief rivers of China. It rises in Kokonor, enters Kansu, traverses part of Mongolia, reenters China, flowing south, east, and northeast, and enters the Gulf of Petchili. It is called "China's Sorrow" from its frequent disastrous floods. Length, estimated, 2,700 miles.

Hyacinthe (yä-sant'), Père. See Loyson, Charles.

Hyacinthus (hī-a-sin'thus). [Gr. Ὑάκινθος.] In Greek mythology, a beautiful youth, son of Amyclas, king of Amyclæ in Laconia, and Diomede. He typified the early vegetation of spring. He was killed through jealousy by Apollo (the sun) while the two were playing at quoits on the banks of the Eurotas. From his blood the god caused the hyacinth to spring, and upon the petals of the plant was thought to be marked the exclamation AI (Woe!). His festival, the Hyacinthia, was observed at Amyclæ during three days in July.

Hyades (hī'a-dēz). [Gr. Ὑάδες.] A group of nymphs, daughters of Atlas and Æthra, and sisters of the Pleiades. They nursed the infant Zeus (or Dionysus), and as a reward were transferred to the heavens as a part of the constellation Taurus. Their rising with the sun was associated with the beginning of the rainy season. The Romans, through a mistaken etymology, called the constellation "the little pigs" (suculæ).

Hybla Heræa (hi'blạ he-rē'ạ). [Gr. Ἱβλαία.] In ancient geography, a city of southern Sicily, about 33 miles west of Syracuse.

Hybla Major (hi'blạ mā'jor) or Magna (mag'nạ). [Gr. Ἱβλαία μείζων or μεγάλη.] In ancient geography, a city in Sicily, on the southern slope of Etna, 11 miles northwest of Catania.

Hybla Minor (hi'blạ mī'nor), or Megara Hyblæa (meg'a-rạ hi-blē'ạ). [Gr. Ἱβλαία μικρὰ or Μεγαρικὴ Ὑβλαία.] In ancient geography, a city of Sicily, situated on the east coast about 12 miles north of Syracuse. It is celebrated for the honey produced in the vicinity. Often confounded with Hybla Major.

Hydaspes (hi-das'pēz). [Gr. Ὑδάσπης.] The ancient name of the river Jhelum.

Hyde (hīd). A manufacturing town in Cheshire, England, situated near the Tame 6 miles east by south of Manchester. Population (1891), 31,682.

Hyde, Edward, first Earl of Clarendon. Born at Dinton, Wiltshire, Feb. 18, 1608 (O. S.); died at Rouen, France, Dec. 9, 1674. An English statesman and historian. He entered Parliament in 1640; became chancellor of the exchequer in 1643; was the chief adviser of Charles I. during the civil war, and of Prince Charles during his exile; and was lord chancellor of England 1660–67, when he was impeached and banished by Parliament. His chief works are a "True Historical Narrative of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England" (generally known as "History of the Rebellion," 1702–04) and "The Life of Edward, Earl of Clarendon, . . . Written by Himself" (1759).

Hyde, Edward, Viscount Cornbury (later third Earl of Clarendon). Died at London, April 1, 1723. An English politician. He was governor of New York 1702–08.

Hyde Park (hīd park). A park in Westminster, London, situated 2¼ miles south by west of St. Paul's. It is one of the largest of the London parks, extending from Westminster to Kensington, and covering an area of about 340 acres. It originally belonged to the manor of Hyde, the property of the monks of St. Peter, Westminster, which fell into the hands of Henry VIII. at the dissolution of the monasteries. During the Commonwealth the park was sold by the Restoration a large part was leased to private holders. In 1670 it was inclosed with a wall and restocked with deer. It is now the principal recreation-ground of London, and is frequented by rich and poor. It has 9 carriage-entrances and many gates for pedestrians. See Serpentine, St. James's Park, Rotten Row, and Kensington Gardens.

Hyde Park. A former township in Cook County, Illinois, now annexed to Chicago.

Hyde Park. A town in Norfolk County, Massachusetts, situated on the Neponset River 8 miles south-southwest of Boston. Population (1890), 10,193.

Hyderabad (hī'der-a-bād'), or Haidarabad (hī'dā-ra-bād'), or The Nizam's Dominions. The principal and commodious of the only most important native state in India, situated in the Deccan between the British provinces of Bombayand Madras. Capital, Hyderabad. The surface is a low plateau. The ruling people are Mohammedans. The prevailing languages are Telugu, Marathi, and Kanarese. In 1768 it was made a Mogul province. About 1713 the viceroy (Nizam-ul-Mulk) became independent. In 1748 there was a disputed succession, one of the rivals being supported by Dupleix and one by the East India Company. A treaty of alliance with England was made in 1766. In the mutiny of 1857 Hyderabad sided with England. Area, 82,698 square miles. Population (1893), 11,537,940.

Hyderabad, or Haidarabad. The capital of the state of Hyderabad, situated on the river Musi. It is an important commercial center. The cantonment of Secunderabad and the old city Golconda are in the neighborhood. Population (1891), with suburbs, 415,039.

Hyder Ali (hī'der a'lē), or Haidar Ali (hī'dār'a'lē). Died at Chittore, British India, Dec., 1782. A maharaja of Mysore. He was of obscure birth; entered the Mysore army in 1749; became virtual ruler of Mysore in 1759; and usurped the title of maharaja in 1766. The English made a league with Nizam and the Mahrattas against him in 1767; a war ensued which resulted in the defeat of the English, who were compelled to sue for peace in 1769. In alliance with the French and Mahrattas, he invaded the Carnatic in 1780, but was defeated by Sir Eyre Coote at Porto Novo, Pollilour, and Sholinghur in 1781.

Hydra (hī'drạ). [Gr. ὕδρα, water-snake.] 1. In Greek mythology, a monstrous dragon of Lake Lerna in Argolis, represented as having 9 heads, each of which, being cut off, was immediately succeeded by 2 new ones unless the wound was cauterized. The destruction of this monster was one of the "twelve labors" of Hercules. — 2. An ancient southern constellation, representing a sea-serpent. It is of Babylonian origin, like most of the ancient constellations. It is bounded by the ancient constellations Canis Minor, Argo, Centaurus, Virgo, Corvus, Crater, Leo, and Cancer, and by the modern constellations Sextans and Monoceros (which separates it from Canis Major). It contains 1 star of the second magnitude, and about 100 stars visible to the naked eye.

Hydra. [Gr. Ὕδρα.] An island in the Greek Archipelago, 7 miles from the Peloponnesus. It contains the seaport of Hydra. It was noted for its trade before the war of independence, and took a leading part in that war. Length, 11 miles. Population, about 7,000.

Hydrabad (hī-drạ-bād'), or Haidarabad (hī'dạ-rạ-bād'). A city in Sind, British India, on the Indus. It is a manufacturing center. It was founded in 1768. Population (1891), 58,085.

Hydriotaphia, or Urn-Burial. A work by Sir Thomas Browne, published in 1658. "It is a descant on the vanity of human life, based on the discovery of certain cinerary urns in Norfolk."

Hyères (ē-ār'). A town in the department of Var, France, near the Mediterranean, on the Riviera, 10 miles east of Toulon: the ancient Castrum Arearum. It is a noted winter health-resort. It was destroyed in the religious wars. Massillon was born there. Population (1891), commune, 14,982.

Hygieia (hī-jē-ē'yạ), or Hygeia (hī-jē'yạ). [Gr. Ὑγιεία, later erroneously Ὑγεία, health.] 1. The goddess of health. She was the daughter of Æsculapius. — 2. An asteroid (No. 10) discovered by De Gasparis at Naples, April 12, 1849.

Hyksos (hik'sōz), or Shepherd Kings. The name given to kings of Egypt, of a foreign race, whose rule (about 2000 B. C.) fell between the 13th and the 18th dynasty, and lasted, according to Manetho, for 511 years.

Hyksos is the Egyptian hik shasu, "chief of the Beduins," or "Shepherds." Shasu being the name given to the semitic nomades of Northwestern Arabia. The Hyksos, however are called Menti or Menti in the inscriptions. Menti being explained in like manner as Shasu, and Aamu to be the natives of Syria. In accordance with this, Manetho speaks of Jerusalem as Hyksos town, and their Egyptian capital, Zoan or Tanis, as a city founded 2076 years before Josephus. xiii. 22. It is possible that their leaders were Hittite princes, though Lepsius believes them to have come from Punt or Southern Arabia. Many of the Hyksos names, as revealed by the few memorials of them that exist, more especially the Ilon of Sun, belong to a very peculiar and non-Semitic type. Sayce, Anc. Empires p. 31.

The exact nationality of the Hyksos is still a matter of dispute. All we know is that they seem to have come from Asia, and they brought with them in their train vast numbers of Semites who occupied the northern part of Egypt. Comparatively few Egyptian monuments have as yet been discovered. These exhibit a peculiar type of features, very unlike that of the Egyptians. The face is thickly bearded, the hair being curly, with a pigtail hanging behind the head. The nose is broad and aquiline, the cheek-bones high, the forehead square and knitted, the lips prominent and expressive of intense determination. The kindly physiognomy so characteristic of the Egyptian face is statuary is replaced by an expression of sternness and vigour. Among the ethnological types presented by the Egyptian sculptures there is only one which can be compared with that of the Hyksos monuments. This is the type peculiar to the inhabitants of Northeastern Syria, in the district called Nahrina by the Egyptians and Aramnaharaim in the Old Testament. It was a district of which the centre was Mitanni in the fifteenth and following centuries before the Christian era, and since the cuneiform tablets recently discovered at Tel-el-Amarna have revealed to us the fact that the language of Mitanni was neither Semitic nor Indo-European, we may perhaps conclude that the population which spoke it was also non-Semitic. However this may be, if we are to regard the so-called Hyksos sphinxes of San as reproducing the Hyksos type of countenance, it would follow that the horde which overwhelmed Egypt in the twenty-third century B. C. were led by princes from Northern Syria. Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 95.

Hylacomylus. See Waldseemüller, Martin.

Hylas (hī'las). In classical mythology, a boy who was a favorite of Hercules. He was carried off by the Naiads who fell in love with him while he was drawing water from a fountain in Mysia.

Hymen (hī'men), or Hymenæus (hi-me-nē'us). [Gr. Ὑμήν, Ὑμέναιος.] Originally, a marriage-song among the Greeks. The names were gradually personified, and Hymen was invoked as the god of marriage. He is represented as a taller and more serious youth than Eros, carrying a bridal torch.

Hymettus (hi-met'us). [Gr. Ὑμηττός.] The ancient name of a mountain in Attica, Greece, southeast of Athens: the modern Trelo Youni. It was celebrated for honey, and also noted for its marble. Height, 3,368 feet.

Hymir (hē'mir). [ON.] In Old Norse mythology, a water-demon, the giant of the winter sea. He dwelt far in the east, at the end of the heavens, by the sea. The glaciers resounded when he returned home from the chase, and his beard was covered with ice. He was the original owner of the kettle in which the gods brewed ale.

Hyogo. See Hiogo.

Hypatia (hī-pā'shiạ). [Gr. Ὑπατία.] A Neo-Platonic philosopher of Alexandria, at the end of the 4th and the beginning of the 5th century, celebrated for her beauty and her unhappy fate.

The celebrity of Theon is obscured by that of his daughter Hypatia, whose sex, youth, beauty, and cruel fate have made her the most interesting martyr of philosophy. After receiving instruction in mathematics from her father who was a professor at the Museum in his native city, she went to Athens, where she became such a proficient in the Platonic philosophy that, on her return to Alexandria, she presided in the public schools there, and taught at once the mathematics of Apollonius and Diophantus, and the philosophy of Ammonius and Plotinus. Her influence over the studious and educated classes in Alexandria, especially the intimacy which subsisted between her and the prefect Orestes, excited the hatred and jealousy of the narrow-minded and unprincipled archbishop, and Cyril found no difficulty in directing the brutal violence of a superstitious mob against one who was described as an enemy of the faith and its ministers. Headed by a ecclesiastic named Peter, a band of fanatics attacked Hypatia, in the spring of A. D. 415, as she was passing through the streets in her chariot, dragged her to one of the churches where they pulled her clothes from her back, and then cast her out into the street, pelted her to death with fragments of earthenware, tore her body to pieces, and committed her mutilated remains to the flames

Hypatia. A novel by Charles Kingsley, published in 1853.

Hyperboreans hī-pėr-bo'ṙē-anz). [Gr. Ὑπερβόρεοι, those who are beyond the north wind.] In early Greek legend, a people who lived beyond the north wind, and were not exposed to its blasts, but enjoyed a land of perpetual sunshine and abundant fruits. They were free from disease, violence, and war. Their natural life lasted a thousand years, and was spent in the worship of Apollo. In later times the Greeks gave the name to inhabitants of northern countries generally.

Very elaborate accounts have been given of the Hyperboreans both in ancient and modern times. Hecatæus of Abdera, a contemporary of Alexander the Great, wrote a book concerning them. They are, however, in reality not a historical, but an ideal nation. The North Wind being given a local seat in certain mountains called Rhipæan, it was supposed there must be a country above the north wind, which would not be cold, and which would have its inhabitants. Ideal perfections were gradually ascribed to this region. According to Pindar, Hercules brought from it the olive, which grew thickly there about the source of the Danube (Ol. iii. 249). When the country had been made thus charming, it was natural to attach good qualities to the inhabitants. Accordingly they were made worshippers of Apollo (Pindar, l. s. c.), observers of justice (Hellan. Fr. 90, and vegetarians (ibid.). As geographical knowledge grew, it was necessary to assign them a definite position, or to banish them to the realms of fable. Herodotus preferred the latter alternative, Damastes the former. Damastes placed them greatly to the north of Scythia, from which they were separated by the countries of the Issedones and the Arimaspi. Southward their boundary was the (supposed) Rhipæan mountain-chain; northward it was the ocean. (Fr. 1.) This arrangement sufficed for a time. When, however, it was discovered that no mountain-chain ran across Europe above Scythia, and that the Danube, instead of rising in the north (compare Pind. Ol. iii. 25 with Isth. vi. 34), rose in the west, a new position had to be sought for the Hyperboreans, and they were placed near the Italian Alps, and confounded with the Gauls and the Etruscans or Tarquinians. A different and probably a later tradition, though found in an earlier writer, is that which assigned them an island as large as Sicily, lying towards the north, over against the country of the Celts, fertile and varied in its productions, possessed of a beautiful climate, and enjoying two harvests a year. In this island it is not difficult to recognize our own country.

Rawlinson, Herod., III. 27, note.

Hyperides, or Hypereides (hī-pėr-ī'dēz). [Gr. Ὑπερείδης, Ὑπερίδης.] A celebrated Attic orator, a contemporary (and probably a younger contemporary) of Demosthenes, and the son of Glaucippus of the deme Collytus. He supported Demosthenes in his opposition to the Macedonian party; later (324) took part in his prosecution on the charge of bribery by Alexander; was chief instigator of the Lamian war; and was slain at Corinth in 322.

Hyperion (hī-pē'ri-on or hī-pėr-ī'on). [Gr. Ὑπερίων.] 1. In Greek mythology, a Titan, a son of Uranus and Gæa. By his sister Theia he was the father of Helios, Selene, and Eos.—2. The seventh satellite of Saturn, discovered by Bond Sept. 16, 1848.

Hyperion. 1. A poetical fragment by Keats, published in 1820.—2. A prose romance by Longfellow, published in 1839. The subjects of the two works are entirely different.

Hyphasis (hif'a-sis). [Gr. Ὑφασις.] The ancient name of the river Sutlej.

Hypocrite, L'. The name under which "Tartufe" was first played.

Hypocrite, The. A play by Buckerstaffe, in which Cibber's "Non-Juror," an adaptation of "Tartuffe," survives. It was produced in 1768.

Hyppolite (ē-pō-lēt'). Louis Mondestin Florvil. Born at Cap Haitien, 1827. A Haitian general and politician. He is a mulatto, the son of one of Soulouque's ministers. He first attained prominence in the civil war of 1867, was the leader of the sanguinary revolt by which Legitime was defeated; and in Oct., 1889, was proclaimed acting president. In May, 1890, he was elected president for seven years.

Hyrcania (hėr-kā'ni-ą). [Gr. ἡ Ὑρκανία.] In ancient geography, a region in Asia which bordered on the Caspian Sea and the Oxus. It corresponded in part to northern and northeastern Persia.

Hyrcanus (hėr-kā'nus) I., or John Hyrcanus. A Maccabean prince of Judea 135–106 B.C. Under him the political achievements of the Maccabees were consolidated and extended. He cleared the young state of heterogeneous and hostile elements by driving out the Hellenists from Palestine and destroying the Samaritan temple on Mount Gerizim, thus accomplishing the dissolution of the Samaritans as a separate religious nation. The Idumeans he forced to accept Judaism. He also extended, by successful wars, the boundaries of Judea, and assured its independence. With Rome he entertained friendly relations. His reign was compared to that of Solomon.

Hyrcanus II. The last and most unfortunate of the Maccabean princes. He was of a weak, irresolute character, but, being the elder of two brothers, was at the death of his mother, Salome Alexandra, 69 B. C., appointed king, while to his more energetic but rash brother, Aristobulus II., was bequeathed the high-priesthood. Soon a conflict broke out between the brothers. The helpless Hyrcanus fell into the hands of the crafty Idumean Antipater, father of Herod, whom he adopted as his guide and counselor. Antipater's machinations brought Pompey to Jerusalem in 63 B. C., an event which was the beginning of the end of Judean independence, and resulted in supplanting the Maccabean race by that of Antipater, the Herodians. Aristobulus II. was led as a prisoner by Pompey to Rome, and was there poisoned. The weak Hyrcanus became a tool of Herod. Even of the dignity of the high-priesthood, to which Herod confined him, he was deprived in consequence of mutilation which he suffered at the hands of the invading Parthians. He finally died the ignominious death of a criminal, Herod ordering his execution on the charge of conspiracy, 30 B. C.

Hysmene and Hysmenias (his'mē-nē and his-mē'ni-as). A Greek romance by a certain Eustathius (or Emathius, or Eumathius), written not earlier than the 9th century A. D.

Hystaspes (his-tas'pēz). [Old Pers. Vishtâspa.] See the extract.

Hystaspes, the son of Arsames and father of Darius—the Gustasp of Persian romance—not only occurs in the genealogical lists, Greek and native, but likewise appears in the Behistun Inscription as actually living in the reign of his son and serving under him. According to Ctesias, he was accidentally killed as he was being drawn up by ropes to examine the sculptures which Darius was having executed for his own tomb. I have already noticed the probability that Hystaspes was the real heir to the throne, on the failure of male issue in the line of Cyrus, but waived his right in favour of his eldest son.

Rawlinson, Herod., IV. 257.

Hythe (hīṫh). [AS. Hȳṫ, the port.] A town in Kent, England, on the Strait of Dover 11 miles west of Dover. It is one of the Cinque Ports, and a military station. Population (1891), 4,351.

Iacchus (i-ak'us). [Gr. Ἴακχος.] In Greek mythology, a divinity peculiar to Athens, and important from his intimate connection with the Eleusinian mysteries. He was a son of Demeter and Zeus, and a brother of Kora (Proserpine) and personified the male element in nature, as his sister the female. At Eleusis he was looked upon as an intermediary between the great goddesses and their votaries, and presided in person (represented by an image crowned with myrtle and bearing a torch) over the splendid procession from the Eleusinium at Athens to the sekos at Eleusis, and over the mysterious rites in the latter sanctuary. At a comparatively late date Iacchus became to some extent confounded with a new type of infant Bacchus, who, as a son of Demeter, was entirely distinct from the older Dionysus.

Iachimo (i-ak'i-mō). In Shakspere's "Cymbeline," a worldly and affected Roman courtier: a brutal villain. He conceals himself in a chest in Imogen's room, and so furnishes himself with details which seem to prove her unchastity.

Iago (i-ä'gō). A character in Shakspere's tragedy "Othello." He is the ancient of Othello, and is filled with jealousy of his rank and power. His cool and calculating villainy, his specious ness, and his bitter sarcasm form an artistic contrast to the noble and frank-natured Othello. In order to revenge himself for the loss of the position as Othello's lieutenant which he failed to secure, partly apparently from sheer love of evil, he raises a whirlwind of passion in the latter's breast by adroitly making him believe in the unfaithfulness of Desdemona, to the final destruction of all three.

Iakon. See Iogore.

Iamblichus (jam'bli-kus). [Gr. Ἰάμβλιχος.] Born at Chalcis, Cœle-Syria: died about 330 A. D. A Syrian Neoplatonic philosopher. He wrote many philosophical and mathematical works, of which only a few have survived. His "Life of Pythagoras" and "Exhortation to Philosophy" were edited by Kiessling (1813–15).

Iapetus (i-ap'e-tus). [Gr. Ἰαπετός.] In Greek mythology, a Titan, son of Uranus and Gæa, and father of Prometheus, Epimetheus, Atlas, and Menœtius. He was thrown by Zeus into Tartarus.

Iapygia (i-a-pij'i-ä). [Gr. Ἰαπυγία.] In ancient geography, a name used vaguely by the Greeks for Messapia or Apulia.

Iapygians (i-a-pij'i-anz). See the extract.

Under the general name of Iapygians were commonly included three distinct tribes, the Messapians, the Peucetians, and the Daunians. The first-named are spoken of as the inhabitants of the Iapygian peninsula, eastward of Tarentum and Brundisium (Strab. vi. p. 401). They were generally derived from Crete, strange as it may appear (Strab. vi. p. 405; Athen. xii. p. 522, F.; Plut. Thes. c. 16; Festus, ad voc. Salentini, etc.). Probably they came in reality, like the other inhabitants of southern Italy, from the Peloponnese, where there was a place called Messapeæ. Rawlinson, Herod., iv. 139, note.

Ibadan (ē-bä'dän). A town in the Yoruba country, West Africa, about lat. 7° 20′ N., long. 4° 30′ E. Population, estimated, 100,000.

Ibarra (ē-bär'rä). The capital of the province of Imbabura, northern Ecuador, about 55 miles northeast of Quito. It was destroyed in 1868 by an earthquake which killed 3,000 of the inhabitants. Population, about 6,000.

Ibea (i-bē'ä). The part of British East Africa under control of the Imperial British East Africa Company. The name is formed from the initials of the above words.

Iberia (i-bē'ri-ä). [L. Ibēria, Gr. Ἰβηρία, from Ibēres, Hiberes, Gr. Ἴβηρες, the inhabitants.] In ancient geography: (a) The peninsula of southwestern Europe, comprising the modern Spain and Portugal. (b) The region bounded by the Caucasus Mountains on the north, Albania on the east, Armenia on the south, and Colchis on the west. It corresponds nearly to the modern Georgia.

Iberian (i-bē'ri-an) Mountains. A name sometimes given to the mountains in central and eastern Spain.

Iberian Peninsula. The southwestern peninsula of Europe, comprising Spain and Portugal.

Iberians (i-bē'ri-anz). The ancient inhabitants of the Iberian peninsula. See the extract.

For this short dark dolichocephalic type we may adopt the usual and convenient name "Iberian." Professor Rolleston prefers the term "Silurian," and it has been variously designated by other writers as the Euskarian Basque, Berber, or Mediterranean race. By some French writers it is called the "Cro-Magnon" type, from a skull, possibly of paleolithic age, found in a sepulchral cavern at Cro-Magnon in Perigord. . . . Before the arrival of the brachycephalic Ligurian race the Iberians range all over the greater part of France. . . . We trace them in the valleys of the Seine, the Oise, and the Marne, frequently in association with the remains of the Ligurian invaders. It, as seems probable, we may identify them with the Aquitani, one of the three races which occupied Gaul in the time of Cæsar (they must have retreated to the neighbourhood of the Pyrenees before the beginning of the historic period. It is in this region, mainly in the valley of the Garonne, that their sepulchral caves are the most numerous. . . . The Iberians, a short Southern dolichocephalic race represented in the long barrows of Britain and the sepulchral caves of France and Spain. The stature averaged 5 feet 4 inches, and the cephalic index 71 to 74. They were orthognathous and swarthy. They are now represented by some of the Welsh and Irish, by the Corsicans, and by the Spanish Basques. Their affinities are African.

Iberus (ī-bē'rus). The Latin name of the Ebro.

Iberville (ē-ber-vēl'), Pierre le Moyne, Sieur d'. Born at Montreal, July 16, 1661: died at Havana, July 9, 1706. A French-Canadian naval and military commander. He entered the French navy at the age of fourteen; was one of the leaders of the expedition against Schenectady in 1690; obtained command of a frigate in 1692; and took Forts Nelson and Bourbon on Hudson Bay in 1694 and 1697 respectively. In 1699, having been commissioned by the French government to establish direct intercourse between France and the Mississippi River, he erected Fort Biloxi, at the head of Biloxi Bay, the first post on the Mississippi River. He subsequently established other posts in the same region, and was preparing to attack the coast of South Carolina when he died of a fever at Havana.

Ibicuhy, or Ibicuí (ē-bē-kwē'). A river in southern Brazil, joining the Uruguay in the province of Rio Grande do Sul, about lat. 29° 20′ S. Length, over 300 miles.

Iblis. See Ebliss.

Ibsen (ib'sen), Henrik. Born at Skien, Norway, March 20, 1828. A noted Norwegian dramatic poet. He at first studied medicine, but soon devoted himself entirely to literature. His first dramatic attempt, the three-act tragedy "Katilina," was published at Christiania, in 1850, under the pseudonym Brynjolf Bjarme. In the same year he went to Christiania in order to pursue his studies at the university. With A. O. Vinje and Botten-Hansen the bibliographer, young men of his own age, he engaged in the editorship of the short-lived weekly journal "Andhrimner," to which he contributed lyrics and satirical pieces. A short saga piece, "Kæmpehøjen" ("The Warrior's Mound") written at this time, was produced upon the stage. On the cessation of the journal the following year, he obtained from the viceroy, the position of manager in the newly opened National Theatre of Bergen, a post which he held until 1857. In 1858, in the interest of the theater, he undertook a short journey to Denmark and Germany to study scenic art. From this period is the historical drama "Gildet paa Solhoug" ("The Banquet at Solhoug"). In 1857 he was called to Christiania as director of the Norwegian Theater. From this year is the historical drama "Fru Inger til Østraat" ("Mistress Inger at Østraat"), which subsequently, however, was almost wholly rewritten. From 1858 is the historical drama "Hermandene paa Helgeland" ("The Warriors at Helgeland"). "Kjærlighedens Komedie" ("Love's Comedy"), the first of the satirical social plays that have particularly made his name famous, was the next important work to appear (in 1862). In 1863 appeared the historic drama "Kongs-Emnerne" ("The Pretenders"). In 1864, after writing the poem "En Broder i Nød" ("A Brother in Need"), a demand to the people to take up the cause of Denmark, how ever, left unheeded—he left Norway in a sort of voluntary exile. In Rome in 1866 he completed one of the greatest of his works, the drama "Brand." This was followed the succeeding year (1867) by the dramatic poem "Peer Gynt," also written in Italy. His next work was the satiric comedy "De Unges Forbund" ("The Young Men's Union," 1867); like all his later works, written in prose. This was followed in 1871 by the long historic drama "Kejser og Galilæer" ("Emperor and Galilean"), which consisted of two parts—"Julian's Apostasy" and "Julian the Emperor." In the meantime he had changed his place of residence, first to Dresden, and later to Munich, where he lived until 1891 recently, when he returned to Christiania. In 1877 appeared, further, "Samfundets Støtter" ("The Pillars of Society"), another satiric comedy. This was followed in 1879 by "Et Dukkehjem" ("A Doll's House," translated under the name "Nora"), in the same vein. His latest plays are "Gjengangere" ("Ghosts," 1881), "En Folkefiende" ("An Enemy of the People," 1882), "Vildanden" ("The Wild Duck," 1885), "Rosmersholm" (1886), "Fruen fra Havet" ("The Lady from the Sea," 1888), "Hedda Gabler" (1890), and "Bygmester Solness" ("Architect Solness," 1892). Among his minor writings are the epic "Terje Vigen" and the long poem "Paa Vidderne" (1860).

Ibycus (ib'i-kus). [Gr. Ἴβυκος.] A Greek lyric poet of the second half of the 6th century B. C., born at Rhegium, Italy. He lived for the greater part of his life at the court of Polycrates of Samos. Fragments of his poems, which were chiefly erotic, have survived. According to the legend, he was murdered at sea, and his murderers were found out through some cranes that followed the ship: hence the "cranes of Ibycus" became a proverb for the agency of the gods in revealing crime.

Iconoclast Emperors. Those Byzantine emperors who were noted for their opposition to image-worship in the Eastern Church. The controversy began with the edict of Leo the Isaurian in 726, and continued until the middle of the 9th century.

Iconoclasts (ī-kon'ō-klasts). A sect or party in the Eastern Empire in the 8th and 9th centuries which opposed all use and honor or worship of icons, or images, and destroyed them when in power. The party of Iconoclasts was originated by the emperor Leo the Isaurian, and afterward continued or revived by Constantine Copronymus and other emperors, especially Leo the Armenian and Theophilus. The emperors named treated those who honored icons with great cruelty, and after the death of the last of them the party of Iconoclasts became extinct.

Ictinus (ik-tī'nus). [Gr. Ἰκτῖνος.] Lived in the middle of the 5th century B. C. A Greek architect, chief designer of the Parthenon. He also designed the temple of Demeter and Persephone at Eleusis, and the temple of Apollo at Bassæ, near Phigalia (the sculptures of this temple are among the treasures of the British Museum). Other architects were associated with him in nearly all of these works. Ictinus and Phidias were identified with Pericles in the execution of his great scheme of public works.

Ida (ī'dä). [Gr. ἡ Ἴδη or Ἴδα.] 1. A mountain-range in Phrygia and Mysia, Asia Minor. At the base of it was the Troad. It was famous in Greek legend especially as a seat of the worship of Cybele. Highest summit, Gargaron (the modern Kaz Dagh, 5,740 feet).

Herodotus appears to have given the name of Ida to the highlands which close in the valley of the Scamander on the left, lying west and south of Bunarbashi.
Rawlinson, Herod., IV. 42, note.

2. The central mountain-range of Crete: the modern Psiloriti. It was the scene of legends of Zeus. Highest point, about 8,000 feet.

Ida (ī'dä). Died 559. A chief of the Angles, the first king of Bernicia. He began to reign in Northumbria in 547. Ida's immediate kingdom did not probably extend south of the Tees, though his power may have been felt beyond that river; for the kingship of Deira, between the Tees and the Humber, does not seem to have been established until his death. It is quite possible that Ida's Bernicia did not extend as far as the Tees. He is said to have had six sons by queens and six by concubines—Deira. The reconciliation and advance of the heathen power under him and his sons caused a widespread apostasy from Christianity among the Picts. He reigned 12 years, and died in 560. On his death Æthelfrith (died 588) became king in Deira, and is supposed to have extended his power over Bernicia (Skene). Dict. Nat. Biog.

Illinois (il-i-noi' or -noiz'). A confederacy of North American Indians, formerly occupying Illinois and adjacent parts of Wisconsin, Iowa, and Missouri. They were allies of the French, and therefore the Iroquois in 1673 began a long and destructive war against them. The name is from illini, 'men'; their own plural ok was changed by the French to their plural ending oez. The five principal component tribes were Peoria, Kaskaskia, Tamaroa, Cahokia, and Michigamea. The assassination of Pontiac by a Kaskaskia in 1766 was avenged by the Lake tribes in a war of destruction. The present number at the Quapaw agency, Indian Territory, is only 165. See Algonquin.

Illinois (il-i-noi' or -noiz'). One of the Central States of the United States of America. Capital, Springfield; chief city, Chicago. It is bounded by Wisconsin on the north and Lake Michigan and Indiana on the east, and is separated by the Ohio from Kentucky on the south, and by the Mississippi from Iowa and Missouri on the west. The surface is generally level. The chief mineral products are coal and lead. The chief crops and industries in the production of corn, wheat, and oats, and his flourishing manufactures. It is the first State in mileage of railways, and the third in population; has 102 counties; sends 2 senators and 22 representatives to Congress; and has 24 electoral votes. It was settled by the French at Kaskaskia and elsewhere in 1682; was ceded to Great Britain in 1763, and to the United States in 1783; became part of the Northwest Territory in 1787, and part of Indiana Territory in 1800; was made a separate Territory in 1809; and was admitted to the Union in 1818. Some later events were Black Hawk's war in 1832 and the Mormon troubles, culminating in 1844. Area, 56,650 square miles. Population (1890), 3,826,351.

Illinois, A river in the State of Illinois, formed by the junction of the Des Moines and Kankakee in Grundy County, 45 miles southwest of Chicago. Illuminated Doctor, The, L. Doctor Illuminatus (dok'tor i-lū-mi-nā'tus). A surname given to the scholastic philosopher Raymond Lully (1235–1315), and also to the German mystic Johann Tauler (1294–1361).

Illuminati (i-lū-mi-nā'ti). [L., 'the enlightened.'] A name given to different religious societies or sects because of their claim to perfection or enlightenment in religious matters. The most noted among them were the Alumbrados (the Enlightened) of Spain in the 16th century; an ephemeral society of Belgium and northern France also called Geuzenbos in the 17th century; and an association of mystics in southern France in the 18th century, combining the doctrines of Swedenborg with the methods of the Freemasons.

Illuminator (i-lū'mi-nā-tor). A surname given to Gregory of Armenia.

Illusion Comique (ē-lü-zyōn' kō-mēk'). L'. A tragicomedy by Corneille, issued in 1636, "of the extremest Spanish type, complicated and improbable to a degree in its action, which turns on the motive of a play within a play, and produces, as the author himself remarks, a division into prologue (Act i.), an imperfect comedy (Acts ii.–iv.), and a tragedy (Act v.)" (Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 295).

Illusions Perdues (pär-dü'). Les. [F., 'lost illusions.'] A work by Balzac, in 3 parts, written in 1837–39–43. He drew in it a picture of the feuilletonists which exasperated the press against him.

Illyria (i-lir'i-ä). F. Illyrie (ē-lē-rē'). G. Illyrien (il-lē'rē-en). [Gr. Ἰλλυρία or Ἰλλυρίς.] A region on the western coast of the Balkan peninsula, north of Greece proper. Its boundaries are vague. It is included now in Montenegro and parts of the Austrian and Turkish empires. The southern part of it came early under Greek influence. The kingdom of Illyria, with Scodra as its capital, was important in the 3d century B. C., and was overthrown by Rome in 168 B. C. For the ecclesiastical Illyricum and the modern Illyria, see below.

The use of the name Illyria is at all times very vague; but it has a more definite meaning as the name of a kingdom whose capital was Skodra, and which, in the second half of the third century, was a dangerous neighbor to the Greek cities and islands on that coast.

Freeman, Hist. Geog., p. 67.

The same remarks apply to the second branch of people occupying the north-west of the Balkan Peninsula, the Illyrians, the last linguistic remains of this branch are preserved in modern Albanian. According to the probable opinion expressed by H. Kiepert (Lehrb. d. alten Geographie, p. 240, f.), this tribe in pre-Hellenic times was widely spread over Greece under the name of Leleges.

Schrader, Aryan Peoples (tr. by Jevons), p. 430.

Inca (ing'kä) Empire. The region ruled by the Incas. At first it was confined to the immediate vicinity of Cuzco. To this were successively added the neighboring valleys, the Titicaca basin, parts of the eastern slope of the Andes, the Peruvian coast, Quito with the neighboring coast-regions, and northern Chile. In its greatest extent, under Huaina Capac, it included nearly all the high land of Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, and northern Chile. Its length, from the river Ancasmayu, north of Quito, to the river Maule in Chile, was about 2,200 miles. The breadth varied from 400 or more to 100 miles. See Incas.

Inca Manco. See Manco.

Inca Rocca (ēn'kä rōk'kä), called Sinchi Roca (sēn'kē rō'kä) by Montesinos. The sixth Inca sovereign of Peru. He reigned about the middle of the 14th century, and his conquests were not extensive. He is best known as the founder of public works, remains of which may still be traced at Cuzco. Blas Valera says that he held the crown more than 50 years, but this is very doubtful.

Incas (ing'käz). [Quichua, 'chiefs' or 'lords.'] The reigning and aristocratic order in ancient Peru from the 13th to the 16th century. Markham and others believe that they were originally a tribe or family of the Quichuas who inhabited certain valleys near Cuzco and first became dominant under Manco Capac about 1200. Their own traditions described Manco Capac as a child of the Sun. From him descended the twelve other historical sovereigns of Peru, the last reigning one being Huascar, though the lineage was preserved long after. These sovereigns (the Incas in a restricted sense) always married their own sisters, and the throne was inherited, in general, by the eldest son proceeding from this marriage. Children by their other wives could not, by custom or law, receive the crown, though this rule was broken when Atahualpa inherited a part of the empire in 1523. The rule of the Incas was absolute, but very mild, and may be described as an extreme form of state socialism with a despotic head: lands and a large proportion of goods were held in common. The Incas, as an order, retained all the important civil and military offices, and the sacerdotal offices were confined to them: thus the sovereign was the head not only of the state and the army, but of the priesthood. It has been stated that the Incas used a language distinct from the Quichua, but this is improbable. The word Inca is often used for the whole Quichua race. See Quichuas and Peru.

Ince-in-Makerfield (ins'in-mā'kėr-fēld). A town in Lancashire, England, near Wigan, 17 miles northeast of Liverpool. Population (1891), 19,255.

The Continental Congress assembled here, and Washington was here chosen commander-in-chief in 1775. The building is now used as a museum of relics connected with the history of the country.

Inderab. See Anderab.

Index Expurgatorius (in'deks eks-pėr-gā-tō'rius). ["Expurgatory Index."] Catalogues of books comprising respectively those which Roman Catholics are absolutely forbidden to read, and those which they may read only after certain emendations have been made in editions expurgated of objectionable passages. They are prepared by the Congregation of the Index, a body of cardinals and their assistants. Pope Paul IV. published a list of forbidden books in 1557 and 1559. The Council of Trent in 1562 attempted the regulation of the matter, but finally referred it to the Pope. He (Pius IV.) published the "Index Tridentinus" in 1564, with numerous additions, under the title "Index Librorum Prohibitorum."

In 1539 Charles the Fifth obtained a Papal bull authorizing him to procure from the University of Louvain, in Flanders, where the Lutheran controversy would naturally be better understood than in Spain, a list of books dangerous to be introduced into his dominions. It was printed in 1546, and was the first "Index Expurgatorius" published under Spanish authority, and the second in the world. Subsequently it was submitted by the Emperor to the Supreme Council of the Inquisition, under whose authority additions were made to it; after which it was promulgated anew in 1559.

India (in'di-ä). [Formerly also Indie (still used, in the plural, in East Indies and West Indies) and Inde: F. Inde, Sp. Pg. It. India, G. Indien, from L. India, Gr. Ἰνδία, from Ἰνδί, Gr. Ἰνδοί, the inhabitants.] An extensive region in southern Asia. The name India is and has been used with very different meanings. With the ancients it meant the country of the Indus river. It was extended through the peninsula, and sometimes made to include Further India and the northern islands of the Malay Archipelago. In modern times it may mean what is sometimes called Hither or Nearer India, the peninsula whose natural boundaries are the Indian Ocean, the Sulaman Mountains, the Himalaya, and the hill-ranges on the Bengal: in this sense it is not so inclusive as the political India (i. e., British India), but includes on the other hand the French and Portuguese possessions. (See Pondicherry, Goa, Malé, Karikal, Daman, Diu, Anjengo, Tanjore.) The name India is also sometimes used for the two peninsulas of Hither and Further India, and sometimes as nearly equivalent to East Indies. The ordinary meaning, however, is British India, or the Indian Empire, officially called India. This includes Bengal, Madras, Bombay, Sind, Aden, Assam, Berars, Ajmere, Central Provinces, Coorg, Northwest Provinces, Oudh, Punjab, Lower Burma, Upper Burma, Andamans, and Quetta and the Bolan, having an area of 964,992 square miles, and a population (1891) of 221,172,952. Feudation there are the tributary native states, including Hyderabad, Mysore, Kashmir, Baroda, states in Rajputana, and states in connection with the Central Provinces, Central India, Panjab, Bengal, Madras, Bombay, Northwest Provinces, etc. Their area is 590,167 square miles, with a population (1891) of 66,050,479. Total area of India, 1,569,150 square miles. Population (1891), 287,223,431. The approximate population of other regions under British supervision, including Sikkim, British Baluchistan, tribes on the Burmese frontier, etc., is about 600,000. The most important exports of India are wheat, rice, cotton, opium, oilseeds, jute, hides, tea, and indigo. The capital is Calcutta. Government is vested in a secretary of state for India (in London), with a council of about 10 (also in London). In India the government is administered by a governor-general appointed by the crown, a council with a centralized system of governors, etc., for provinces, and commissioners and deputy commissioners for divisions and districts. About three fourths of the inhabitants are Hindus in religion; Mohammedans come next (over 50,000,000). To them the Ganges is a holy river, and the Indus was for practical purposes what it was etymologically, the valley of the Indus. Meanwhile in India itself it did not seem so natural as it seems to us to give one name to the whole region. For there is a very marked difference between the northern and southern parts of it. The great Aryan community which spoke Sanscrit and invented Brahminism spread itself chiefly from the Panjab along the great valley of the Ganges, but not at first far southward. Accordingly the name Hindostan properly belongs to this northern region. . . . Etymologically India is not a political name, but only a geographical expression like Europe or Africa." (J. R. Seeley, Expansion of England, p. 222.) India mentioned in Esther I, 1, viii, 9, as the limit of the territories of Ahasuerus on the east, probably includes the country surrounding the Indus, the Panjab. The name Indu (Hindu) also occurs in the cuneiform inscription of Nakhsh-i Rustem. Whether any of the Indian names known to the Phœnicians, Hebrews, and Assyro-Babylonians before the Persian kings is uncertain. The view that Ophir, whither the mercantile fleet of Solomon and Hiram sailed, was in India has been generally given up. The knowledge of the ancients concerning India, before the expeditions of Alexander the Great and Seleucus I., was in general very limited. West India (India extra Gangem) is the term by which Europeans of and east of the Iranian highland and south of the Indus. Alexander the Great penetrated India as far as the Hydaspes in the east and the mouth of the Indus, many in the south. The island of Ceylon was known by the name of Taprobane, or Salike, the inhabitants being called Sale. Indian Empire. Same as British India. See India.

Indian Mutiny, or Sepoy Mutiny. The revolt against British authority in India 1857–58. Its immediate cause was the introduction into the Sepoy army of a new rifle-cartridge regarded (not without reason, on the cartridge); this offended the religious prejudices of the soldiers. The mutiny began at Meerut May 10. The chiefest act of cruelty was at Delhi, where the native garrison massacre of the Europeans was ordered by Nana Sahib, and Lucknow. Lucknow garrison was relieved by Havelock in September, and again by Campbell in November. Delhi was retaken in September 1857. Lucknow in March, conquered in March, 1858; and the last resistance was suppressed in 1858. The last Mogul (titular emperor) was banished.

Indian Ocean. The part of the ocean lying between Asia on the north, Africa on the west, the Malay Archipelago and Australia on the east, and an arbitrary line (about lat. 38° S.) connecting the southern extremities of Australia and Africa on the south. Its chief branches are the Bay of Bengal and the Arabian Sea (west of Hindostan and Red Sea). It contains Madagascar, Mascarene Islands, Socotra, Ceylon, Andaman Islands, Nicobar Islands, Lakkadive Islands, and Maldive Islands. Its entire drainage-system is small, consisting chiefly of the Indus, Ganges, Brahmaputra, Irawadi, and the rivers of the Deccan. Length from the Cape of Good Hope to Tasmania, about 6,000 miles; from Africa to Malay Peninsula, 7,000.

Indian Queen, The. A tragedy in heroic verse by Sir Robert Howard and John Dryden, produced in 1664.

Indian Territory. A territory of the United States. It is bounded by Kansas on the north, Missouri and Arkansas on the east, Texas on the south and Oklahoma on the west. Its surface is generally level and rolling. Herding is the chief industry. It is unorganized. The Indian tribes Cherokees (Cherokees, Creeks, and Seminoles conduct their own affairs. Tahlequah is the Cherokee land is the chief town. The region was acquired in 1803 and 1845. In 1854 it was set apart for the Indians who were removed during this period from their original homes. The portion north of lat. 37° was settled afterward by the Indians to the United States. In the civil War the Indians sided with the Confederates. (See the articles on the various tribes.) Area (1890), 31,400 square miles. Population (1890), 180,498.

Indians (in'di-anz) (of North America). The aboriginal inhabitants of North America. They were so named on the supposition that the lands discovered by the navigators were parts of India. The term Indians has continued in use, notwithstanding attempts at its correction. Schoolcraft invented for the North American Indians the name Algonkin, for those of the eastern coast; Aztaue, for those west of the Mississippi and Ostic, for those who live between these limits; but no other writer has used them. The latest attempt, equally unsuccessful, calls the North American tribes Jouve-Matinonians. Marpion being a name for the river Amazon, and Jouve a word connected with a Northern myth. Setting aside the grotesqueness of these names, the theories came from errors in the names of the ethnic divisions of North America. Each tribe called itself by a name in its own language which seems to be complicated and varying; and its several neighbors called it in their languages by other names, which, according to their existing relations, might be terms of eulogy, of friendship, or of simple topographical description. The methods adopted by the French, English, Spanish, and Dutch to express the native pronunciation added to the confusion, and a large proportion of these accounts (often relied upon in literature and in statistics, the population (which was itself multiplied through fear or through interest) being sometimes doubled or trebled, and sometimes even more exaggerated in the best official estimates. Subsequently many of the erroneous names disappeared, and then it was inferred that the tribes so named had become extinct. From these appearances, mainly, the opinion was generally entertained, that the rapid extinction of the North Americans is without a parallel in history, and that it is due to an inherent defect, vis inertiæ, through which civilization is fatal to the part of the human race found in the western hemisphere. The present number of Indians in the United States is about 300,000. The number in British America is not so accurately known, and that in Mexico, being more affected by mixture of blood, is still less determinable. Besides the actually ascertained errors in nomenclature, other considerations affect the questions concerning population, habitat, and migrations, upon which, together with language, a proper classification depends. Before the European invasion the North American tribes had reached a state of quasi-equilibrium, and were sedentary to the extent that their territories were recognized, and, though many of them held districts too large for actual occupancy, the limits were substantially defined. While agriculture had commenced in some parts of the present area of the United States, and was spreading, it nowhere sufficed to replace hunting, which demands enormous areas per capita for support, and the population had not increased, except perhaps in a small part of Mexico, so as to press upon the food-supply. Contrary to the current opinion, the Indians were not nomadic until after the arrival of Europeans, who drove many tribes from their established seats to those occupied by other tribes, and from the same Europeans they procured the horse and firearms, both of which were necessary to a nomadic life under the existing conditions. The wars with the invaders and those occasioned by their pressure, in which firearms were used, were far more destructive than the former quarrels between tribes. The losses and decline of most of the tribes during recent decades are now known with sufficient precision to allow an estimate of the effect of civilization upon them. By the connection it must be noted as important that many individuals of aboriginal blood have disappeared from the numerical strength of tribes, not by extinction but by absorption. From all these considerations it is concluded that the Indian population of North America at the time of the Columbian discovery was not very greatly in excess of that now extant. The Bureau of Ethnology, established by Congress in 1879, has brought the classification and nomenclature of the Indians of North America into system and approximate correctness. In Mexico, British America, Greenland, and the United States, the Indians, those found both north and south of the Mexican border and excluding the remainder of Mexico, are divided into 57 linguistic families or stocks, each of which, including tribes of culture, and often apparently as distinct as the Aryan and Scythian linguistic stocks. In all the stocks were languages, sometimes but one language, sometimes as many as thirty. The differences between which were such that the speakers failed either entirely or in large part to understand each other. The names assigned to these stocks in this work are those given by the authority who first recognized each particular stock in a publication; and the termination an or ian is now added to each to distinguish between the stock names and tribal names, many of the latter being identical, which would be identical and confusing. The 57 linguistic families or stocks in the territory mentioned are as follows: Algonquian, Athabascan, Beothukan, Caddoan, Chimakuan, Chimarikan, Chimmesyan, Chinookan, Chitimachan, Chumashan, Cohuiltecan, Copehan, Costanoan, Eskimauan, Esselenian, Kalapooian, Kamilaukawan, Keresan, Kiowan, Kitunahan, Koluschan, Kulanapan, Kusan, Lutuamian, Maipurian, Moquelumnan, Muskhegan, Natchesan, Pahlahtuan, Pimans, Piuman, Quoratean, Salinan, Salishan, Sastikan, Shoshonean, Siouan, Skittagetan, Takilman, Tanoan, Timuquanan, Tonikan, Tonkawan, Uchean, Waiilatpuan, Wakashan, Weitspekan, Wintunian, Yakonan, Yanan, Yukian, Yuman, and Zuñian. These stocks differ widely in the amount of territory occupied, in the number of component tribes, and in the number of individuals supposed as belonging to them. Some claimed the combined areas of a number of the present States and Territories of the United States, while the known habitat of others was not more than a modest township. Some stocks were differentiated by the language of a single tribe now known; others comprise many tribes, those of the Algonquian stock amounting to 86 tribes, each linguistically unique, one of which has been regarded by some authority to be a tribe. Some are extinct, or are represented only by a score of living persons; others by populations now of thousands. The first subdivision of the linguistic stocks, more permanent than temporary alliances or leagues for special purposes, is the "confederacy"; but it is not a constant feature. Sometimes it is found in certain stocks where several neighboring tribes have acted together for a considerable period in an approach to the nationality common in civilized life. These confederacies do not embrace all the tribes of any stock, and are not confined to people speaking the same language; indeed, interpreters have been employed in the councils of confederacy between the delegates of the component tribes. In this connection it must be noted that tribes of the same linguistic family are often better hereditary enemies, so that language does not affect political classification. The unit of classification is the tribe, which often is indistinguishable from the village. The latter often extended over a considerable area, and was usually composed of widely separated dwellings, each of them the home of a domestic family, though sometimes several families occupied the same dwelling. Another division is the clan or gens; but, as it is neither political nor ethnic, and as it interpermeates all other divisions, its titles are not mentioned in this work. Those appearing here absolutely as the names of confederacies or tribes are selected as having been the most used in literature, and are not expressed in the determined scientific transliteration which is required for the more extended study of linguistic stocks, but in the form most frequently found in publications.

Indies (in'diz), also formerly Indias (in'di-az). The name given by Columbus and early geographers to the American islands and mainlands then supposed to be a part of Asia: later, when their true nature was known, they were distinguished as the West Indies, and the latter term was eventually retained for the islands now bearing that name. Many writers of the 16th century use the word Indies in a restricted sense for the country now included in Mexico.

Innisfail (in'is-fal). A poetical name of Ireland.

Innocent (in'o-sent) I., Saint. Died March 12, 417. Bishop of Rome 402–417. During his pontificate Rome was sacked by Alaric (410). He is commemorated in the Roman Catholic Church on July 28.

Innocent II. (Gregorio de' Papi or Papareschi). Died Sept. 23, 1143. Pope 1130–43. He was elected in an irregular manner by a minority of the college of cardinals on the death of Honorius II., whereupon the majority of the cardinals, claiming the exercise of the validity of his election, chose Anacletus II. as antipope. He was forced to seek refuge in France, where Bernard of Clairvaux procured his recognition by the court and the clergy. He was installed in the Lateran at Rome by the emperor Lothair in 1133, but did not gain undisputed possession before the death of Anacletus in 1138.

Innocent III. (Giovanni Lothario Conti). Born at Anagni, Italy, in 1161: died at Perugia, Italy, July 16, 1216. Pope 1198–1216. He was the son of Count Trasimundo, of the house of Conti, and Clarice, a descendant of the house of Scotti at Rome. He was educated in Paris, and Bologna, became a canon of St. Peter's in 1183, and cardinal-deacon of St. Sergius and St. Bacchus in 1190; and was crowned pope Feb. 22, 1198. Following in the footsteps of Gregory VII., he made it the chief aim of his ecclesiastical policy to vindicate the papal claim of the supremacy of the church over the state. He forced Philip Augustus of France to take back his repudiated queen, Ingeburga of Denmark, in 1200; instigated the fourth Crusade (1202–04), the chief result of which was the capture of Constantinople from the Greeks and the establishment of the Latin Empire; deposed Otto IV., emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, and in 1215 crowned his former ward, Frederick of Sicily, emperor; compelled in 1213 John of England to submit to the papal scepter in Langton, the papal nominee to the archbishopric of Canterbury, to acknowledge the feudal sovereignty of the Pope and to pay an annual tribute, and was the originator of the Albigensian crusade (1208); and presided at the fourth Lateran Council in 1215. During his pontificate the papal power attained its greatest height.

Innocent IV. (Senibaldi di Fieschi). Died at Naples, Dec. 7, 1254. Pope 1243–54. He inherited from his predecessors a feud with the emperor Frederick II., who had been excommunicated by Gregory IX. in 1239. After the death of Frederick in 1250, and of his son the emperor Conrad IV. in 1254, the struggle was continued with Manfred, the uncle and guardian of Conrad's son, Conradin, who inflicted a decisive defeat on the papal troops 5 days before Innocent's death.

Innocent V. (Pietro di Tarantasia). Born in 1225; died at Rome, June 22, 1276. Pope Jan. 20–June 22, 1276.

Innocent VI. (Étienne d'Albert). Born at Brissac, France; died Sept. 12, 1362. Pope 1352–62. He kept his court at Avignon.

Innocent VII. (Cosimo de' Migliorati). Born at Sulmona, Abruzzi, Italy, 1336; died at Rome, Nov. 6, 1406. Pope 1404–06. He was opposed by the antipope Benedict XIII., who resided at Avignon.

Innocent VIII. (Giovanni Battista Cibo). Born at Genoa, 1432: died July 25, 1492. Pope 1484–92. He was involved in war with Ferdinand of Naples, whose crown he offered to Rene, duke of Lorraine, and kept Zizim, brother of the sultan Bajazet, a close prisoner in consideration of an annual payment of 40,000 ducats and the gift of the sacred spear said to have pierced the side of Christ.

Innocent IX. (Giovanni Antonio Facchinetti). Born at Bologna, Italy, 1519: died Dec. 30, 1591. Pope Oct. 29–Dec. 30, 1591.

Innocent X. (Giovanni Battista Pamfili). Born at Rome, 1572: died Jan. 7, 1655. Pope 1644–55. He condemned the treaty of Westphalia in 1648, and the Jansenists in 1653.

Innocent XI. (Benedetto Odescalchi). Born at Como, Italy, 1611: died Aug. 12, 1689. Pope 1676–89.

Innocent XII. (Antonio Pignatelli). Born at Naples, March 13, 1615: died Sept. 27, 1700. Pope 1691–1700.

Innocent XIII. (Michelangelo Conti). Born at Rome, May 15, 1655: died March 7, 1724. Pope 1721–24.

Innsbruck (ins'brük), or Innspruck. The capital of Tyrol, Austria, situated on the Inn in lat. 47° 17′ N., long. 11° 24′ E.: the ancient Œni Pons, or Œnipontum. It is noted for its picturesque situation. The Franciscan church or Hofkirche, a Renaissance building, notable especially for its magnificent monument to the emperor Maximilian I. The kneeling figures of the emperor, in bronze, on a great marble sarcophagus, is surrounded by 28 statues of his ancestors. The sides of the sarcophagus are adorned with 24 reliefs of scenes from the emperor's life, most of them by the Flemish painter Colyn. These reliefs are among the finest sculpture of the 16th century; many of the figures are portraits. The Schloss Ambras is a fine castle of the 13th century, refitted and enlarged in the 16th by the archduke Ferdinand. It is now a museum, with very interesting collections, chiefly historical, including medieval and modern weapons, furniture, industrial art, sculpture and portraits. The 16th-century spanish saloon is notable as to the ornamental ceiling. Pointed chapel. It has several other castles and a university. It was made a city in 1234. Desperate fighting between the Tyrolese and Bavarians occurred here in 1809. Population (1890), 23,226.

Inns of Chancery. Inns subordinate to the Inns of Court (which see).

Inns of Court. Legal societies in London which have the exclusive privilege of calling candidates to the bar, and maintain instruction and examination to that purpose; also, the precincts or premises occupied by those societies respectively. They are the Inner Temple, Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn. The first two originally belonged to the Knights Templars (whence the name Temple). Three inns had their origin about the end of the 13th century. The inn was originally the town residence of a person of quality. "Before the Temple was leased to lawyers, the laws were taught in hostels, be pity-serjeants or apprentices there were a great number in the metropolis, especially in the neighborhood of Holborn, but afterward the Inns of Court and Chancery in process of time prevailed (by reason of the commodiousness of their scituation for students, practice of pleaders, and judges of the law of the realm, not living on common stipendiaries in the other universities, as they do here) to have most of them wholly at their private maintenance." Hare, London, I. 59.

Innuit (in'ū-it). See Eskimauan.

Innvirtel (in'fer-tel). The region between the Inn, Danube, and Salzach. It was ceded to Austria in 1779, to Bavaria in 1809, and again to Austria in 1816.

Insatiate Countess, The. A tragedy acted in 1610, and attributed to Marston, though adhered by Barkstead. It was sometimes mentioned as "Barkstead's Tragedy." The play which bears the full name of "The Insatiate Countess" has been considered by him from two others: one a tragedy, one a comedy. Marston probably wrote the play in 1602. Ebeling.

Inselsberg (in'sels-berg). One of the chief summits of the Thüringerwald, west of Friedrichroda. Height, 3,000 feet.

Instauratio Magna (in-stâ-rā'shi-o mag'na). [L., "the great renewal."] The comprehensive philosophical work planned and partially carried out by Lord Bacon, comprising the "Advancement of Learning," "Novum Organum," etc. See Bacon, Francis.

Insterburg (in'ster-bürg). A town in the province of East Prussia, situated at the junction of the Angerapp and Pissa, 53 miles east of Königsberg. Population (1890), commune, 22,257.

Institute of France. [F. Institut de France, often simply Institut.] An association of the members of the five French academies, L'Académie Française, L'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres, L'Académie des Sciences, L'Académie des Beaux Arts, and L'Académie des Sciences Morales et Politiques. It was established by the Republican Convention in 1795, and reorganized by the government. It proposes "to advance the sciences and art, or research by the publication of discoveries and by essays, prizes, and other literary labors, and to promote the close scientific and literary labors which shall have for their end general utility and the glory of the nation." It was originally called Institut National, and the name has changed with the various changes in the government. At first the association was installed at the Louvre, but in 1806 was removed to the Palais des Quatre Nations. There is a general annual meeting on the 25th of October, the anniversary of its founding.

Instituto Historico e Geographico Brazileiro. [Pg., "Brazilian Historical and Geographical Society."] A society established at Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, in 1839, for the encouragement of historical and geographical studies. Since its foundation it has published the "Revista Trimestral," now (1894) numbering seven volumes, and containing documents of the highest interest. It possesses a very valuable library.

Insubres (in'sū-brez). In ancient history, a Gallic people in Cisalpine Gaul, dwelling north of the Po, in the vicinity of Milan. They were finally subjected to Rome in 196 B. C.

Interim (in'ter-im). A provisional arrangement for the settlement of religious differences between Protestants and Roman Catholics in Germany during the Reformation epoch, pending a definitive settlement by a church council. There were three interims: the Katisbon Interim promulgated by the emperor Charles V., July 29, 1541, but ineffective; the Augsburg Interim, proclaimed also by Charles V., May 15, 1548, and carried out by many Protestant states; and the Leipzig Interim, 1548, through the influence of Saxony. In 1552, by the treaty of Passau, Maurice and the other Protestant princes and cities obtained the religious liberty which they had demanded as a condition of the Interim in March, 1548. See Maurice, Elector of Saxony, and Religious debates among the reformers previous to the peace of Passau, 1552.

Interlaken (in'ter-lä-kon) or Interlachen (in'ter-lä-chen). A summer resort in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, on the Aare, between Lakes Thun and Brienz, 25 miles southeast of Bern. It is a celebrated tourist center. The other name is the Hohenweg. It contains a casino and an old monastery. Population, about 2,000.

International (in-ter-nash'o-nal), The. A society (in full, "The International Workingmen's Association"), formed in London in 1864, designed to unite the working classes of all countries in promoting social and industrial reform by political means. Its chief aim was: (1) the abolition of capital, through the transformation of industrial capitalists from the capitalists to bailees of working men; (2) the encouragement of men on strike by gifts of money, on the principle that a general rise in wages may thereby be effected without profit to the employers; (3) the overthrow of all law, custom, and privilege considered hostile to the working class, and the encouragement of whatever tends to the bettering of body or labor for public education, etc.; (4) the end of all wars. In 1869 the International had become a powerful organization, and was represented throughout the continental European governments. Internal dissensions in 1870 complicated with the dangers of the Paris Commune in the preceding year, and other disturbances, caused a great loss of members and strength.

International African Association. An international commission presided over at the Brussels Conference of 1876. Its object was to aid the exploration and civilization of Central Africa. Several committees were formed in different countries, with headquarters to cooperate in the work. Those at Brussels, Out of it grew the Kongo Committee, the International Association of the Kongo, and the Kongo Free State.

Inwood, William. Born at Highgate about 1771; died at London, March 16, 1843. An English architect. His chief work is St. Pancras New Church, London (1819–22), which is an adaptation of Athenian models, chiefly the Erechtheum.

Io (ī'ō). [Gr. Ἰώ.] In Greek mythology, the beautiful daughter of Inachus, king of Argos, Greece, who was changed by Hera (Juno), in a fit of jealousy, into a white heifer, and placed under the watch of Argus of the hundred eyes. When Argus was killed by Hermes at the command of Zeus, the heifer was maddened by a terrible gadfly sent by Hera, and wandered about until she arrived in Egypt. She recovered her original shape, and bore Epaphus to Zeus. Epaphus became the ancestor of Ægyptus, Danaus, Cepheus, and Phineus. According to another legend, Io was carried off by Phenician traders who landed in Argos. The myth is generally said to lead to be a hint or the moon wandering in the starry skies, symbolized by the hundred-eyed Argus; her transformation into a horned heifer representing the crescent moon.

Greek mythology, too, knew her [Astarte] as Io and Europa, and she was fitly symbolised by the cow whose horns resemble the supine lunar crescent as seen in the south.
Sayce, Ane. Empires, p. 105.

Iolaus (ī-ō-lā'us). [Gr. Ἰόλαος.] In Greek legend, the charioteer and companion of Heracles.

Ion (ī'on). [Gr. Ἴων.] In Greek mythology, the ancestor of the Ionians, the subject of a tragedy by Euripides.

Ion. [Gr. Ἴων.] 1. A play of Euripides, exhibited about 424 B. C. Its theme is the legend that Ion, eponymous founder of the Ionian race, was the son of Creusa, daughter of Erechtheus, by Apollo.

There is no character in all Greek tragedy like this Ion, who unites one shrouch of the charming boys drawn by Plato in such dialogues as "Charmides" and "Lysis." In purity and freshness he has been compared to Giotto's shepherd, and has afforded Racine his masterpiece of imitation in the Joas of the "Athalie." But I would liken him still more to the child samuel, whose ministrations are painted with so exquisite grace in the Old Testament.
Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 349.

2. A tragedy by Thomas Noon Talfourd, privately printed in 1835, and produced the next year at Covent Garden. It is properly a dramatic poem, and is the author's masterpiece.

Ion of Chios. Born at Chios: died before 42 B. C. A Greek poet. Fragments of his tragedies and lyrics have survived.

Iona (ī-ō'nā), or Icolmkill (ī-kōm-kil'). [Originally Hii or I: written Iona by Adamnan, whence, by a blunder, Iona.] An island of the Inner Hebrides, in Argyllshire, Scotland, 1½ miles southwest of Mull, from which it is separated by the Sound of Iona. The cathedral is a small but very interesting edifice, now roofless, though the masonry is complete. It was founded in the 13th century, but exhibits some details as late as the 16th. Some specimens of plate-tracery in the square central tower are especially curious. St. Martin's and Mackenzie crosses may be any interesting examples of the many sculptured Runic crosses with which Iona formerly abounded. It was an ancient seat of the Druids. Columba founded a monastery here about 565, which became a leading colonizer in the spread of Celtic missions. The Culdees were replaced by Benedictines in the 13th century. The monastery was demolished in 1151. Length, 3½ miles. Population, about 200.

Ioni. See Aiemni.

Ionia (ī-ō'ni-ā). [Gr. Ἰωνία.] In ancient geography, a maritime region on the western coast of Lydia and Caria, Asia Minor, with Chios and Samos and the adjacent islands. It comprised on the mainland the cities Phocæa, Clazomenæ, Erythræ, Teos, Lebedus, Colophon, Ephesus, Priene, Myus, Miletus, and later Smyrna. It was colonized in prehistoric times by Ionians from European Greece; was conquered by Cyrosus in the middle of the 6th century B. C.; passed later to Persia; was the scene of an unsuccessful revolt 500–494; became on the close of the Persian war a dependent ally of Athens; and passed to Persia in 387, and to Macedonia in 334. Later it fell to Pergamum and Rome. It was celebrated for its wealth, and for the early development of art, music, philosophy, and literature.

Ionian Islands (ī-ō'ni-an ī'landz). 1. The collective name of Corfu, Santa Maura, Cephalonia, Zante, Paxos, Ithaca, and Cerigo, and some smaller islands, belonging to Greece. They form the modern nomarchies of Corfu, Cephalonia, Zante, and part of Argolis and Corinth. They were acquired by Venice from about 1400; were annexed to France in 1797; were conquered by the Russians and Turks in 1799; formed the republic of the "Seven United Islands" 1800–07; were annexed to France in 1807; were placed under British protectorate in 1815; and were ceded to Greece in 1864. See Corfu, Cephalonia, and the other separate islands.

Iphicrates (i-fik'ra-tēz). [Gr. Ἰφικράτης.] Lived in the first half of the 4th century B. C. An Athenian general, noted for his improvements in the equipment of the peltasts. He defeated the Spartans near Corinth 392 B. C. (?).

Iphigenia (if i-ji-ni'ā). [Gr. Ἰφιγένεια.] In Greek legend, the daughter of Agamemnon and Clytæmnestra (Clytemnestra and Helen (A.) According to the legend, when the fleet which was to sail against Troy was becalmed at Aulis, through the anger of Artemis with Agamemnon, the seer Calchas (or the Delphic oracle) declared that the sacrifice of Iphigenia (or, in some accounts of propitiating the goddess. Agamemnon sent for his daughter, but when she arrived Artemis carried her away in a cloud to Tauris, and a stag (or other animal, or another person) was substituted for her in the sacrifice. While she was at Tauris as a priestess of Artemis, her brother Orestes, accompanied by his friend Pylades, came with the intention of carrying off the celebrated image of the goddess. Iphigenia saved him from being put to death as a stranger, and fled with him and the image. Another story has frequently been made the subject of dramatic poetry.

There were "Iphigenias" by both Æschylus and Sophocles, which were soon obscured by the present play [of Euripides]. Both Nævius and Ennius composed well-known tragedies upon its model. Erasmus translated it into Latin in 1524; T. Sibillet into French in 1549. Dolce gave an Italian version in 1560. There are obscure French versions by Rotrou (1640), and by Leclerc and Coras (1675), the latter in opposition to the great imitation of Racine in 1674. Racine's remarkable play, written by a man who combined a real knowledge of Euripides with poetic talent of his own, is a curious specimen of the effects of French court manners in spoiling the simplicity of a great masterpiece. An English version of Racine's play, called "Achilles; or, Iphigenia in Aulis," was brought out at Drury Lane in 1700, and the author in his preface to the print boasts that it was well received, though another Iphigenia failed at Lincoln's Inn Fields about the same time. This rare play is bound up with West's "Recuba" in the Bodleian. The famous opera of Gluck (1774) is based on Racine, and there was another operatic revival of the play in Dublin in the year 1846, when Miss Helen Faucit appeared as the heroine. The version (by J. W. Calcraft) was based on Potter's translation, and the choruses were set to music, after the model of Mendelssohn, by R. M. Levey. I fancy this revival was limited to Dublin. Schiller translated Euripides' play (1790), and there is an English poetical version by Cartwright, about 1867 (with the "Medea" and "Iph. Taur.").
Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 371.

There yet remains the very famous "Iphigenia" of Goethe for our consideration. This excellent play has been extolled far beyond its merits by the contemporaries of its great author, but is now generally allowed, even in Germany, to be a somewhat unfortunate mixture of Greek scenery and characters with modern romantic sentiment. It therefore gives no idea whatever of a Greek play, and of this its unwary reader should be carefully reminded. Apart from the absence of Greek life, and the introduction of a sort of confidant of the king, Arkas, who does nothing but give stupid and unheeded advice, the character of Thoas is drawn in no barbarian king should have been drawn—a leading character, and so noble that Iphigenia cannot bring herself to deceive him, a scruple which an Athenian audience would have derided. Equally would they have derided Orestes' proposal, of which Thoas approves, to prove his identity by single combat, and still more the argument which Iphigenia prefers to all outward marks—the strong yearning of her heart to the stranger. The whole diction and tone of the play is, moreover, full of idealistic dreaming, and conscious analysis of motive, which the Greeks, who painted the results more accurately, never paraded upon the stage.

Iphigenia. A tragedy by John Dennis, acted at Lincoln's Inn Fields in 1700. The story is taken from Euripides's "Iphigenia in Tauris."

Ireland, John. Born near Wem, Shropshire; died at Birmingham, Nov., 1808. An English author. He worked as a watchmaker in Soho, near London. In 1786 he published the "Letters and Poems of John Henderson the actor. In 1793 he issued Boydell's Hogarth Illustrated (1793). In 1798 was a supplementary volume of this work, he published his "Life of Hogarth," with engravings of some hitherto unpublished drawings. This is the standard biography of Hogarth.

Ireland, Samuel. Born at London; died there, July 1, 1800. An English author and engraver. Originally a weaver in Spitalfields, London, he later went into business as a dealer in prints and drawings, instructing himself in drawing, etching, and engraving. In 1790 he won a premium from the Society of Arts. In 1795 he exhibited at the Royal Academy for the first and only time. From 1790 to 1795 he etched many plates after Mortimer and Hogarth. He published (1786) and Pictures of Thames is best known as the dupe of his son, William Henry Ireland, in the affair of the Shakspere forgeries.

Ireland, William Henry. Born probably at London, 1777: died there, April 17, 1835. A forger of Shakspere manuscripts. He is supposed to have been an illegitimate son of Samuel Ireland. He visited Stratford-on-Avon about 1794 with his father, an admirer of Shakspere, who fully believed a story of the recent destruction of Shakspere's own manuscripts. On his return to London he began his famous series of forgeries of Shakspere manuscripts. Among these are a mortgage deed signed on old parchment with a genuine seal, which he had been engaged to facsimile by Steevens; Shakspere's signature on the fly-leaves of old books; a transcript of "Lear"; and extracts from "Hamlet" (the orthography copied from Queen Elizabeth's Prayer-book). In 1795, these documents were exhibited by the elder Ireland at his house in Norfolk street. On Feb. 23 Dr. Parr, Sir Isaac Heard, Herbert Croft, Mr. Pye, the poet laureate, and Boaden signed a paper testifying to their belief in their genuineness. To these Ireland added a new blank-verse play "Vortigern and Rowena," in Shakspere's autograph, and a tragedy, "Henry II.," which he said he had copied from Shakspere's original, which were examined by Sheridan of Drury Lane and Harris of Covent Garden. On April 2, 1796, "Vortigern" was produced by Kemble at Drury Lane. Its complete failure led to the exposure of the entire fraud, and before the end of the year Ireland published "An Authentic Account of the Shakspearian MSS." He also published a number of ballads, poems, novels, memoirs, and translations. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Ireton (ir′ton). Henry. Born in Nottingham, England, 1611: died near Limerick, Ireland, Nov. 26, 1651. An English Parliamentary officer and son-in-law of Cromwell. In 1626 he became a gentleman commoner of Trinity College, Oxford, graduating B. A. in 1629. At the beginning of the civil war he was the chief supporter of the Parliamentary interest in Nottinghamshire, and June 30, 1642, was made captain of the Nottingham horse. He attached himself very intimately to Cromwell, with whom he had great influence; was made commissary-general of the horse at Naseby; and married Cromwell's daughter Bridget, June 15, 1646. On Oct. 30, 1645, he was returned to Parliament for Appleby. He took part in the treaty between the commissioners of the army and Parliament. He hoped to base the foundation of an agreement between the king and Parliament, and to reestablish the liberties of the people on a permanent basis. When Charles I. however, refused the "Four Bills," Ireton advised the settlement of the affairs of the kingdom without him. In the trial of the king he sat regularly in the High Court of Justice, and signed the warrant for the king's execution. On June 15, 1649, he went with Cromwell to Ireland as second in command, and became his deputy May 29, 1650.

He settled in Chile, where he took a prominent part in the revolution 1810–18. Subsequently he held various diplomatic posts for Chile, and from 1855 was minister of Guatemala and Salvador to the United States. He edited several journals in various Spanish-American countries, published historical and philological works and a collection of satirical poems, and was a well-known bibliophilist.

Irish (ī′rish). The language of the native Celtic race in Ireland. It is in age and philological value the most important language of the Celtic family, though its antiquity and importance have been much exaggerated by tradition and patriotism. The alphabet is an adaptation of the Latin. As here written it has the letters like the so-called Anglo-Saxon letters, are usually made to resemble a conventionalized form of the Latin alphabet in use in Britain in the early middle ages. Gaelic is a comparatively recent form of the Irish spoken by the Celts of Scotland. It differs but slightly from the Irish of the same age. Modern Irish is greatly corrupted in pronunciation, as compared with the Irish of 1000 A. D., but in great part the old orthography. As a living speech it is fast going out of use.

It was founded in 1652, and is the chief commercial city of Siberia and the seat of a bishop. Government manufactured for its tea trade. It was nearly destroyed by fire in 1879. Population, 56,254.

Irmin (ėr′min), or Irmino (ėr′mi-nō). In Germanic mythology, a god, eponymic ancestor of the Herminones.

Irminones. See Herminones.

Irminsul (ėr′min-sōl). A Saxon idol cast down by Charlemagne, near Eresburg, about 772. Hermann, or Arminius, the hero of Teutonic independence, was the object of the Saxons' admiration, and they called this idol Irmensaule (Hermann's Sculpture, Hermann's Pillar), from a fancied resemblance of the word. No real connection of the idol with Hermann existed.

The Irmin-Sul, or Column of Hermann, near Eresburg, the modern Stadtberg, was the chosen object of worship to the descendants of the Cherusci, the Old Saxons, in defence of which they fought desperately against Charlemagne and his Christianized Franks. "Irmin," says Sir Francis Palgrave, "in the cloudy Olympus of Teutonic belief, appears as a king and a warrior; and the pillar, the Irmin-Sul, bearing the statue, and considered as the symbol of the deity, was the Palladium of the Saxon nation until the temple of Eresburg was destroyed by Charlemagne, and the column itself transferred to the monastery of Corbey, where perhaps a portion of the rude rock-idol yet remains, covered by the ornaments of the Gothic era."

Philip Smith, Hist. World, III. 368.

Irnerius (ėr-nē′ri-us), or Warnerius (wär-nē′ri-us). Lived first quarter of the 12th century. A noted Italian jurist. See the extract.

Irnerius, by universal testimony, was the founder of all learned investigation into the laws of Justinian. He gave lectures upon them at Bologna, his native city, not long, in Savigny's opinion, after the commencement of the century. And, besides this oral instruction, he began the practice of making glosses, or short marginal explanations, on the law-books, with the whole of which he was acquainted. We owe also to him, according to ancient opinion, though much controverted in later times, an epitome, called the Authentica, of what Gravina calls the prolix and difficult (salebrosis atque garrulis) Novels of Justinian, arranged according to the titles of the Code.

Iroquoian (ir-ō-kwoi'an). A linguistic stock of North American Indians, historically of great importance though numerically inferior to several others. The conduct of a part of these tribes, which are collectively called Iroquois, in the colonial period markedly shaped the history of America north of Mexico, as at the first collisions they became the allies of the English against the French and by their early procurement of firearms, perhaps more than by the preeminent valor and sagacity imputed to them by most writers, they mastered and drove off from immense districts all the tribes before occupying them which would not submit to their rule. The St. Lawrence River valley was the earliest known habitat, whence they gradually moved southwest along the shores of the great lakes. Cartier in 1535 found between Quebec and Montreal a part of the recorded fragments of whose language indicate that they were Wyandots. (See Iroquois.) The Iroquoian tribes were notably sedentary and to a considerable extent agricultural, depending comparatively little upon hunting, and were remarkable for their skill in house-building and fortification. The remaining Indians of this stock, both in the United States and in Canada, are distinguished for their advance into civilization. As a rule they are prosperous and increasing in numbers. Their whole population now is about 43,000, of whom over 34,000 are in the United States and nearly 9,000 in Canada. They are divided both linguistically and geographically into 4 groups, as follows: northern group—Wyandot, Tionontati, Tobacco nation, Neuter, Hochelaga; central group—Mohawk, Oneida, Onondaga, Cayuga, Seneca, Erie, Conestoga; southern group—Tuscarora, Nottoway, Meherrin, Hoconee, Cheree; Cherokee group—Elati or Lower Cherokee, Middle Cherokee, and Atali or Upper Cherokee. The name of the linguistic stock is taken from the form Iroquois, which has been applied specifically to the confederacy or league also called the "Five Nations," and later the "Six Nations."

Iroquois (ir-ō-kwoi'). [The name, given by the French, was derived from an exclamation used by the speakers of the confederacy.] A well-known confederacy of the North American Indians. They called themselves by a name meaning 'we of the long house,' also by another, meaning 'real men.' The Delaware name for them was Mengwe, corrupted into Mingo. The English knew them as the Confederate or Five Nations, and, after the admission of the Tuscarora, as the Six Nations. The confederacy was, about 1540, composed of five tribes, Mohawk, Oneida, Onondaga, Cayuga, and Seneca, extending across New York State, in the order named, from Hudson River to Lake Erie. According to tradition they had before lived on the St. Lawrence River, whence they had been driven by Algonquian tribes. After procuring firearms from the Dutch, they made war upon all the surrounding tribes, driving off some, incorporating some, and making others tributary, until their rule was acknowledged from the Ottawa River to the Tennessee, and from the Kennebec to the Illinois and Lake Michigan. During the Revolution these tribes sided with the English, with whom they had before been allied against the French; and afterward the Mohawks and Cayugas followed Brant in a body to Canada. They, with some individuals of other tribes of the confederacy, settled and still remain at a reservation on Grand River, Ontario, and at other points in that province. Those in the United States are on reservations in New York except the Oneidas, who are chiefly at Green Bay, Wisconsin. The so-called Senecas of the Indian Territory are really "Mingos" collected from all the Iroquois tribes, and the Catholic Iroquois at Caughnawaga, St. Regis, and Oka have no connection with the confederacy. The numbers of the latter are now about 15,000, including mixed blood. See Iroquoian.

Irrawaddy. See Irawadi.

Irredentists (ir-ē-den'tists). An Italian political party, formed in 1878 for bringing about the "redemption" or the incorporation into the kingdom of Italy of all regions situated near Italy where an important part of the population was Italian, but which were still subject to other governments, and hence called Italia irredenta ('unredeemed Italy').

Irrefragable Doctor, L. Doctor Irrefragabilis (dok'tor ir-ref-ra-gab'i-lis). A surname given to the scholastic philosopher Alexander of Hales.

Irtysh, or Irtish (ir'tish; Russ. pron. ir-tish'). A river in Sungaria and western Siberia, which joins the Obi about 190 miles north of Tobolsk. It traverses Lake Zaisan. Its chief affluents are the Ishim, Tobol, Bukhtarma, and Om. Length, over 1,000 miles; navigable to Lake Zaisan.

Irun, or Yrun (ē-rōn'). A town in the province of Guipuzcoa, Spain, situated near the French frontier 19 miles southwest of Bayonne. Population (1887), 9,264.

Irus (i-rus). 1. In Homeric legend, a beggar of gigantic stature who kept watch over the suitors of Penelope, and was employed by them as messenger. He was celebrated for his voracity. — 2. The Blind Beggar of Alexandria in Chapman's play of that name. He assumes many disguises.

Iruwai (ir'ō-wi). A tribe or division of North American Indians formerly living in Scott Valley, Siskiyou County, California. In 1851 it had seven villages and an estimated population of 420. See Mareip.

Irvine (ėr'vin). A seaport in Ayrshire, Scotland, situated on the river Irvine 23 miles southwest of Glasgow. Population (1891), 4,554.

Irving (ėr'ving). Edward. Born at Annan, Dumfriesshire, Scotland, Aug. 4, 1792; died at Glasgow, Dec. 7, 1834. A Scottish preacher and divine. He was licensed to preach by the presbytery of the extreme Presbyterians, seceders from the Church of Scotland. In 1822 he obtained the mastership of the academy at Kirkcaldy, where he formed a warm friendship for Thomas Carlyle. In 1825 he went to Edinburgh to approve himself for the ministry, and Oct., 1819, became assistant to Dr. Chalmers in Glasgow. He removed to the little chapel in Hatton Garden, London, July, 1822, where he immediately won extraordinary popularity. At this time begin the peculiar mental and religious aberrations which are associated with his career. In 1825 he made a tour of Scotland with the object of proclaiming the imminence of the second advent. Another expedition to Scotland followed, and in 1830 his doctrine of the Humanity and Catholic Doctrine of Our Lord's Human Nature" exposed him to our direful charges of heresy. The "unknown tongues," a pentecostal phenomenon, were first heard in March, 1830, from the mouth of Mary Campbell, in Port Glasgow, and spread to the prayer-meeting assemblies, but Oct. 16, 1831, the services of his new Regent Square church were disturbed by a woman who gave utterance to an unintelligible discourse. An attempted prosecution for heresy failed in Dec., 1830; but on April 26, 1832, he was removed from his church. On March 6, 1833, the London presbytery of the Presbyterian of Annanism charge of heresy concerning the sinlessness of Christ. This practically terminated his career. The "Irvingite" or "Catholic Apostolic Church" still survives. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Irving, Henry, stage name of John Henry Brodribb (brod'rib). Born at Keinton, near Glastonbury, England, Feb. 6, 1838. A noted English actor. He made his first appearance at the Sunderland Lyceum in 1856. After playing at Edinburgh for some time he made his first London appearance at the Princess's Theatre in 1859. He made no distinct mark till 1870, when he played Digby Grant in Albery's "Two Roses." He played with success till 1874, when his performance of Hamlet created genuine interest. In 1878 he undertook the management of the Lyceum Theatre, where his success has been great. He has produced a large number of new plays and Shakspearian revivals. In 1883, 1884, 1886, and 1893 he came to the United States with his company, including Miss Ellen Terry. He is especially distinguished in "Hamlet," "Othello," "Merchant of Venice," "Richard III.," "Richelieu," "The Bells," "Louis XI.," "Henry VIII.," "Becket," etc.

Irving, Theodore. Born at New York, May 9, 1809; died at New York, Dec. 20, 1880. An American clergyman and author, nephew of Washington Irving.

Irving, Washington. Born at New York, April 3, 1783; died at Sunnyside, near Tarrytown, N.Y., Nov. 28, 1859. An American historian, essayist, and novelist. He was the son of an Englishman, William Irving, who came from the Orkneys. He entered a law office when quite young, and wrote literary squibs for the "Morning Chronicle," under the pseudonym "Jonathan Oldstyle." His health obliged him to travel, and in 1804 he was sent abroad for two years. On his return he undertook the publication, with James K. Paulding, of "Salmagundi." In 1809 he published his "History of New York, by Diedrich Knickerbocker." Its success established his literary position. In 1810 he became a partner in a commercial house established by two of his brothers. In 1815, however, he went abroad again, and lived there till 1832. In 1826 he was attaché of the United States legation at Madrid, and in 1829 was made secretary of legation at London. He lived principally at Sunnyside (Wolfert's Roost) from 1832 till 1842, when he was appointed minister to Spain. He returned in 1846 to Sunnyside where he lived till his death. Besides the works above mentioned, he wrote "The Sketch-Book" (which came out in parts in 1819, and collected in 1820), "Bracebridge Hall, or the Humourists" (1822), "Tales of a Traveller" (1824), "Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus" (1828), "Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada" (1829), "Voyages of the Companions of Columbus" (1831), "The Alhambra" (1832), "Crayon Miscellany" (including "Tour on the Prairies," 1835), "Astoria, etc." (with Pierre M. Irving, ls36), "Adventures of Captain Bonneville, etc." (1837), "Oliver Goldsmith" (1849), "Mahomet and his Successors" (1850), "Wolfert's Roost" (1855), "Life of George Washington" (1855–59). Works in the "Geoffrey Crayon" edition (96 vols., 1880); "Life and Letters" edited by Pierre Irving (1861–67).

Irvingites (ėr'ving-īts). A religious denomination named from Edward Irving (1792–1834). Irving was not the founder of the sect usually called after him, but accepted and promoted the spread of the principles upon which, after his death, the sect was formed. Its proper name is the Catholic Apostolic Church, and it has an elaborate organization derived from its twelve "apostles," the first body of whom was completed in 1835. It recognizes the orders of angels, prophets, evangelists, pastors or "angels," elders, deacons, etc. It lays especial stress on the early creeds, the eucharist, prophecies, and gift of tongues. It has an extremely ritualistic service and an elaborate liturgy. The adherents are few in number, and are found chiefly in Great Britain. There are some on the continent of Europe and in the United States.

Irwin (ėr'win), Sir John. Born at Dublin, 1728; died at Farnham, May, 1788. An Irish general, the son of Alexander Irwin. As lieutenant in his father's regiment he was granted a year's furlough for continental travel in 1748, when he commenced a regular correspondence with Lord Charlemont, which continued for twenty years. He is supposed to have suggested to Charlemont his paper on "Good Breeding," which appeared in the "World," Oct. 30, 1755. Irwin afterward became governor of Gibraltar (1766–68), and commander-in-chief and privy councilor in Ireland 1775.

Isaac (ī'zak). [Heb., 'the laugher.' See extract below.] A Hebrew patriarch, son of Abraham and Sarah, and father of Jacob and Esau.

> The name of his father Isaak is probably also an abbreviation for "Isaak-el," "He whom God" (the name El). It may be that the holy tribe was so designated at a certain epoch; or the Isaakel may perhaps have been a Puritan group anterior to that of the Jakobel.

German empress, wife of the emperor Frederick II., and second daughter and fourth child of John, king of England, and Isabella of Angoulême. Her marriage with Frederick II. was concluded July 15, 1235. Her daughter Margaret was born Feb., 1237, and by marriage with Albert, landgrave of Thuringia, became ancestress of the Saxe-Coburg-Gotha house.

Isabella I., surnamed "The Catholic." Born at Madrigal, April 22, 1451: died at Medina del Campo, Nov. 24, 1504. Queen of Castile 1474–1504, daughter of John II. of Castile. She married, in 1469, Ferdinand of Aragon, conjointly with whom she succeeded her brother, Henry IV., as monarch of Castile in 1474. She equipped the expedition of Columbus in 1492. See Ferdinand V., King of Castile.

Isabella II. (Maria Isabella Louisa). Born at Madrid, Oct. 10, 1830. Queen of Spain 1833–1868, daughter of Ferdinand VII. whom she succeeded under the regency of her mother, Maria Christina. See Maria Christina, and Carlos, Maria Isidro Balthasar Diego. She assumed personal control of the government in 1843; was deposed and banished by a revolution which broke out at Cadiz, Sept. 16, 1868; and resigned her claim to the throne in favor of her eldest son (afterward Alfonso XII.), June 25, 1870.

Isabella. 1. A character in Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso," loved by Zerbino, and killed by Rodomont.—2. A character in Shakspere's comedy

"Measure for Measure," the sister of Claudio, and object of the base passion of Angelo, but rescued and married by Vincentio, the duke.—
3. A character in Webster's tragedy " Vittoria Corombona, or The White Devil": the wife of the Duke of Brachiano, lover of Vittoria. To shield him from the vengeance of her family because of his ill treatment of her, she purposely plays the shrew to make them think her worthless.
4. The "insatiate countess" in Marston's play of that name. She alternately attracts her lovers and induces their successors to kill them.—
5. The wife of Biron in Southerne's "Fatal Marriage." She marries Villeroy, being deceived into a belief in Biron's death; and after his return and actual death she dies distracted. Isabella was a favorite part with Mrs. Barry, Mrs. Siddons, and other tragic actresses. The play was afterward known as "Isabella."
6. One of the principal characters in Mrs. Centlivre's comedy "The Wonder."

Isabella of Angoulême. Died at Fontebrand, 1246. Queen of King John of England and daughter of Ejmery, count of Angoulême, by Alicia, daughter of Peter of Courtenay, a younger son of Louis VI. of France. She was married to John during his visit to France, Aug., 1200. Her first son (afterward Henry III.) was born Oct. 1, 1207. In Dec., 1214, she was imprisoned in Gloucester by order of John, and was probably there when he died. In 1217 she returned to France, and May, 1220, married Hugh, count of La Marche.

Isabella of France. Born 1292: died at Hertford, Aug. 23, 1358. Queen of Edward II. of England, and daughter of Philip the Fair, king of France. They were married at Boulogne, Jan. 25, 1308. Her first son (afterward Edward III.) was born Nov. 13, 1312, at Windsor. Edward II. treated her with extreme unkindness. Driven from England by the influence of the Despensers, she raised an army, and with Roger Mortimer in command, Sept. 24, 1326, landed at Harwich, beginning the civil war which terminated with the deposition of Edward II. by the Parliament in London, Jan. 7, 1327, and the recognition of Edward III., then 14 years old. Isabella and Mortimer ruled in his name. In 1330 Edward III. and Henry of Lancaster conspired against her, and she was arrested with Mortimer at Nottingham, Oct. 18. Mortimer was executed.

Isabella of France. Born at the Louvre, Paris, Nov. 9, 1389: died at Blois, Sept. 13, 1409. The second daughter of Charles VI. of France, and second queen of Richard II. of England. The marriage contract was signed March 9, 1396, when she was 7 years old. After Richard's death she was restored to France (July, 1401), and June, 1404, married Charles, count of Angoulême, the poet.

Isabella (so called from Isabella of Castile, queen of Spain). The first European city in the New World, founded by Christopher Columbus, Dec., 1493, on a small bay of the northern shore of the island of Española or Haiti, 25 miles west of the present town of Puerto Plata. It was abandoned soon after the founding of Santo Domingo city, and only a few ruins now remain to mark its site.

Isabelle (é-sä-bel'). 1. A young girl brought up by Sganarelle in Molière's "Ecole des maris." He sedulously keeps her from knowledge of the world or of pleasure, intending to marry her. She eludes his vigilance and marries Valère. See Léonor.
2. An amusing and mischievous girl in Dryden's "Wild Gallant."

Isabey (é-zä-bā'). Eugène Louis Gabriel. Born at Paris, July 22, 1804: died at Lagny, Seine-et-Marne, April 27, 1886. A French painter, son of J. B. Isabey, noted especially for his marines. He went to Algiers in 1830, as royal marine-painter, with the expedition of that year. He received medals of the first class in 1824, 1827, 1855, and became a member of the Legion of Honor in 1832 and officer in 1852.

Isabey, Jean Baptiste. Born at Nancy, France, April 11, 1767: died at Paris, April 18, 1855. A French miniature-painter, a pupil of Girardet and Claudet (at Nancy), and of Dumont and David (at Paris). Among his portraits are those of Josephine, Napoleon, his marshals, members of the Congress of Vienna, etc.

Isabinda (is-a-bin'dä). One of the principal characters in Mrs. Centlivre's comedy "The Busybody," the daughter of Sir Jealous Traffick, who keeps her from the sight of all men.

Isæus (i-sē'us). [Gr. Ἰσαῖος.] Born at Chalcis (at Athens ?): lived in the first half of the 4th century B. C. One of the ten Attic orators. His 11 extant orations, mainly on contested inheritances, have been edited by Schömann (1830), Burmann (1889). English translation by Sir William Jones.

Isaiah (i-zā'yä or i-zī'yä). [Heb., 'salvation of Jehovah.'] A Hebrew prophet who prophesied from 740 B. C. till 701 B. C. He was the greatest of the Hebrew prophets and orators, a consistent opponent of the policy of the Hebrew kings to enter into entangling alliances with foreign powers. Once, however, the alliance with Assyria being formed, he counseled the keeping of faith, continually asserting that no dependence could be placed on Egypt. Chapters xl.–lxvi. of Isaiah, which relate to the captivity and return, are usually considered the work of a post-exilic prophet called by scholars Deutero-Isaiah.

He was the greatest of a race of giants. He gave their final form to Hebrew ideas. He is not the founder of Judaism: he is its classical genius. Semitic speech reaches in him its highest combinations.
Renan, Hist. of the People of Israel (trans.), II. 408.

Isaiah's poetical genius is superb. His characteristics are grandeur and beauty of conception, wealth of imagination, vividness of illustration, compressed energy, and splendor of diction.

Ischia (ēs'kē-ä). An island belonging to Naples, Italy, near the entrance of the Bay of Naples, 16 miles west-southwest of Naples: the ancient Æ*n*aria (sometimes Pithecusa or Inarime), and mediæval Iscla. It contains several volcanoes; is noted for its fertility and for its warm baths; and produces wine and fruit. The capital is Ischia. It was visited by an earthquake in 1883, causing a loss of about 7,500 lives. Area, 36 square miles. Population, 32,170.

Ischl (ish'l). A watering-place in Upper Austria, situated at the junction of the rivers Ischl and Traun, 27 miles east by south of Salzburg. It is the favorite resort of the Austrian royal family and nobility, and contains salt and other baths. It is the central point in the Salzkammergut. Population (1890), commune, 8,473.

Iseghem (ē'se-gem). A town in the province of West Flanders, Belgium, 25 miles west-southwest of Ghent. It has manufactures of linen. Population (1890), 9,965.

Isengrim (is'en-grim), Sir. The wolf in "Reynard the Fox."

Iseo (ē-zā'ō), Lago d'. A lake in Lombardy, Italy, 15 miles east of Bergamo: the ancient Lacus Sebinus. It is traversed by the Oglio. Length, 14½ miles. Height above sea-level, 605 feet.

Isère (ē-zär'). A river in southeastern France, joining the Rhone 7 miles north of Valence: the ancient Isara. Length, about 175 miles.

Isère. A department of France. Capital, Grenoble. It is bounded by Ain on the north, Savoy on the northeast, Hautes-Alpes on the southeast, Drôme on the southwest, and Rhône and Loire on the west, and is formed from the northern part of the ancient Dauphiné. The surface is mountainous, particularly in the southeast. The chief occupations are agriculture, working of minerals, and the manufacture of gloves, paper, etc. Area, 3,201 square miles. Population (1891), 572,145.

Iserlohn (ē-zer-lōn'). A town in the province of Westphalia, Prussia, on the Baar 44 miles northeast of Cologne. It has a large trade, and manufactures wire, needles, brass ware, etc. Near it are cadmia mines. Population (1890), commune, 32,117.

Isernia (ē-ser'nē-ä). A town in the province of Campobasso, Italy, 52 miles north of Naples: the ancient Æsernia. It contains the remains of ancient walls. Population, about 7,000.

Iseult (i-sōlt'). In Arthurian romance: (a) The daughter of Anguish, king of Ireland, known as Iseult the Fair. She was the wife of Mark, king of Cornwall, and loved Sir Tristram or Tristan. (b) The daughter of Hoel or Howell, king of Brittany. She was the wife of Sir Tristram, and was known as Iseult of the White Hands. See Tristram.

Mr. Leith (on the legend of Tristan, p. 39) gives the following enumeration of the forms of name: Isolde, Yseus, Yseutz, Yseut, Ysseulz, Izeutz, Yseul, Ysou, Ysolt, Isault, Essylt, Ysaus, Yseult, Iset, Ysalde, Yseuda, Yzeult, Iseulte, Isol, Isodda, Ysonde, Ysonde, Ysote, Isond, Isotta, Iseo, Isawde, Isowde, Isod, Isold, Ysiaut, and Ysoud, to which Hisolda may be added.

Isfendiyar (is-fen-di-yär'), in Pers., correctly, Asfandiyar (es-fen-di-yär'), or Aspandiyar (es-pen-di-yär'). A hero of the Shahnamah, son of King Gushtasp, the Constantine of the Zoroastrians. After many exploits he was called to conquer Arjasp, a demon king, who had taken captive two daughters of Gushtasp, and to tender his sister in marriage. For this he undertook his "seven labors." Choosing, like Rustam, the shortest and most perilous way to the enemy's stronghold, he first slew his monitors—wolves, secondly, conquered a fierce lion and his mate; thirdly, slew a fierce dragon; fourthly, withstood the wiles of a beautiful woman who, caught in Asfandiyar's noose, became first a cat and then a wolf, and finally a black, flame-vomiting demon, and was then slain by him; fifthly, slew a Simurgh, a gigantic bird, which tried to bear him away; sixthly, brought his troops through a furious storm of wind and snow; and seventhly, traversed a deadly desert. Reaching the brazen fortress, Asfandiyar collected a hundred camels and entered it with his warriors disguised as a merchant caravan, when his brother Bishutan attacked it from without, as he within. After this success Gushtasp wished Asfandiyar to go against Rustam, to whom Kaikhusran had given Zabul, Kabul, and Nimruz. Asfandiyar pleaded the nobility and services of Rustam, but the king was obdurate. Rustam came out to welcome Asfandiyar, but when told the errand of the latter refused to yield. The heroes fought on two successive days. Rustam was wounded but recovered and, guided by the Simurgh which had cared for his infancy, on the second day lodged an arrow made by the Simurgh's direction from the kazu tree, in the eye of his antagonist, who fell. Zal and Rustam both came to offer sympathy, but Asfandiyar died, intrusting his son Bahman to the care of Rustam.

Isha (ē'shä; with Vedic accent, ē-shä'). [Skt., 'Lord.'] A title of Shiva; also, with a long, the name of an Upanishad of which Ishavasya is the first word. It is also known as the Vajasaneyasanhita Upanishad. It is translated by Muller in "Sacred Books of the East," I. 311.

Ishbosheth (ish bō'sheth). [Heb., 'man of shame.'] A son of Saul, proclaimed king of Israel after his father's death. See Daveid.

In our text of the Books of Samuel, Saul's son and successor is called Ishbosheth, but in 1 Chronicles viii. 33 he is called Eshbaal. Eshbaal means 'Baal's man,' a proper name of a well-known Semitic type, precisely similar to such Arabic names as Imrau-l-Kais, 'the man of the god Cais.' W. R. Smith, O. T. in the Jewish Ch., p. 55.

Ishim (ish'im). A river of Siberia which joins the Irtish about 120 miles southeast of Tobolsk. Length, about 1,000 miles.

Ishmael (ish'mā-el). [Heb., 'God heareth.'] The son of Abraham and Hagar: regarded by the Arabs as their ancestor.

Ishmaelites (ish'mā-el-its). The descendants of Ishmael, Abraham's son, who, as is related in Gen. xxi. 14, was driven into the wilderness with his mother, Hagar. His twelve sons were "princes" or heads of tribes. The Arabs regard him as their ancestor.

Ishpeming (ish'pem-ing). A city in Marquette County, northern Michigan, 14 miles west by south of Marquette: the center of an iron district. Population (1890), 11,197.

Ishtar (ish'tär), or Istar (is'tär). The principal and most popular deity of the Assyro-Babylonians, the goddess of love and war, uniting, as it were, the Aphrodite (Venus) and Athene (Minerva) of the Greeks, and corresponding in name and character to Ashtoreth (Astarte) of the Syro-Canaanites, only that she ruled the planet Venus while Ashtoreth was identified with the moon. In her warlike character she was conceived by the Babylonians as ruling the morning star; as goddess of love she ruled the evening star. In her former character she was also called Anunit, and had her principal seat at Agane, where was the temple E-anu ('House of Heaven'), with a voluptuous cult. With the Assyrians she was the wife of Ashur, and was sometimes called Belit ('Lady'); they distinguished between Ishtar of Arbela, who presided over battles, and Ishtar of Nineveh, in whom the voluptuous aspect predominated. Ishtar also occurs as an appellation, or generic name, for a goddess in general. On the relation of Ishtar to Tammuz, see Adonis and Istubar.

Isidorian Decretals, The. A code of native and foreign canons which circulated in Spain in the 6th century, and was afterward accepted throughout the Roman Catholic Church: so called from Isidorus Hispalensis, who was erroneously supposed to have compiled it. Also called the Spanish Decretals.

Isidorus (iz-i-dō'rus) Hispalensis, or Isidore (is'i-dōr) of Seville. Born at Cartagena, Spain, about 560: died April 4, 636. A Spanish ecclesiastic and miscellaneous writer. He became bishop of Seville in 600. His works, which were held in high esteem during the middle ages, include "Originum seu etymologiarum libri xx." "De ecclesiasticis officiis libri duo," and "Sententiarum sive de summo bono libri tres." He has been erroneously accredited with the compilation of the so-called Isidorian Decretals (which see).

Isidro (ē-sē'drō), San. See the extract.

His [Lope's] subject was well chosen. It was that of the great fame and glory of San Isidro the Ploughman. This remarkable personage, who plays so distinguished a part in the ecclesiastical history of Madrid, is supposed to have been born in the twelfth century, on what afterwards became the site of that city, and to have led a life so eminently pious that the angels came down and ploughed his grounds for him, while the holy man neglected in order to devote his time to religious duties. From an early period, therefore, he enjoyed much consideration, and was regarded as the patron and friend of the whole territory, as well as of the city of Madrid itself. But his great honours date from the year 1568. In that year Philip the Third was dangerously ill at a neighbouring village; the city sent out the remains of Isidro in procession to avert the impending calamity; the king recovered: and for the first time the holy man became widely famous and fashionable.

Ticknor, Spanish Lit., II. 365.

Isis (ī'sis). 1. [Gr. Ἶσις.] In Egyptian mythology, the chief female deity, the sister, wife, and female counterpart of Osiris, and the mother of Horus. She is distinguished by the solar disk and cow's horns on her head, often surmounted by a diminutive throne, and bears the lotus sceptre. By the Greeks she was identified with Io. Her worship in a modified form, as a nature-goddess, was introduced subsequently to the Alexandrine epoch into Greece, and was very popular in Rome from the end of the republic. The Greek and Roman priests and priestesses of Isis wore a special costume, and had as an attribute a peculiar metallic rattle, the sistrum. On her statue was an inscription translated by Plutarch: "I am that which is, has been, and shall be. My veil no one has lifted. The fruit I bore was the Sun": hence the well-known allusion to a mystery as "the veil of Isis," or as covered with "the veil of Isis."

Isis, at once the sister and wife of Osiris, and the mother of Horos. At Thebes she was known as Mut, 'the mother,' with the vulture's head; at Bubastis as Sekhet, the bride of Ptah and daughter of Ra. As mother of Horos, she was named Hathor or Athor, 'the house of Horos,' identified by the Greeks with their Aphrodite, and confused with Astoreth by the Semites. The cow, with its horns, symbolising the crescent moon, which in Egypt appears to lie upon its back, was venerated to her, indicating at how early a time the bride of Osiris, the Sun-god, was held to be the moon. She was also identified with Sothis, the dog-star, and in later days with the planet Venus. All that is good and beautiful among men comes from her; she watches over the birth of children, and rocks the cradle of the Nile. As Neit, too, she is the authoress of weaving and of the agents of female life, as Anuke, Imperial, p. 64.

2. An asteroid (No. 42) discovered by Pogson at Oxford, May 23, 1856.

Isla (ēs'lä), José Francisco de. Born at Segovia, Spain, 1703: died at Bologna, Italy, 1781. A Spanish satirist and Jesuit preacher. He was the author of the satirical romance "Historia del famoso predicador Fray Gerundio de Campazas" ("History of the Famous Preacher Friar Gerundio of Campazas," 1758–70).

It was an attack on the style of popular preaching, which, originally exemplified by Paravicino, the distinguished follower of Góngora, had been constantly falling lower and lower, until at last it seemed to have reached the lowest point of degradation and vulgarity. The assailant was Father Isla, who was born in 1703 and died in 1781, at Bologna, where, being a Jesuit, he had been sent as an exile, on the general expulsion of his order from Spain.

Isocrates (ī-sok'ra-tēz). [Gr. Ἰσοκράτης.] Born at Athens, 436 B. C.: died 338 B. C. One of the ten Attic orators, distinguished as a teacher of eloquence after about 392. Of his orations twenty-one are extant.

Thus this remarkable writer [Isocrates] lived through three of the most eventful generations in Greek history, and, though one of the most prominent writers of his time, may be said to have produced no influence whatever except upon the form of prose writing. For he was in no sense a thorough-going man. He was a curious combination of sophist and patriot, of would-be politician and philosopher, of really private and public man at the same time. The candour and honesty of his nature made him in feeling a patriot, while his want of appreciation for deeper politics prevented him from seeing the evils of despotism, or taking any thorough interest in the forms and varieties of constitutions. His bashfulness compelled him to remain in private life, while his vanity urged him to appear in public; his profession suggested to him the study of philosophy, while his intellect was incapable of understanding its higher problems. Thus his egregious vanity and self-complacency were perpetually wounded by the consciousness that he had, after all, not made his mark upon the age, and that, though eminent and widely respected, he was neither consulted nor obeyed by the men whom he most desired to influence. He aspired to the position of a Swift or a Voltaire, with the duties of an Addison or a Pope. Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., II. 216.

Isola (ē'sō-lä). A small town in Italy, on the Liris about 60 miles east-southeast of Rome.

Isola Bella (bel'lä) and Isola Madre (mä'dre). [It., 'fair island' and 'mother island.'] The two chief islands of the Borromean Islands (which see) in Lago Maggiore.

Isonzo (ē-son'zō). A river in Görz and Gradiska, Austria-Hungary, flowing into the Gulf of Trieste 13 miles northwest of Trieste. Length, about 80 miles.

Isouard (ē-zō-är'), or Isoard (ē-zō-är'), Nicolò. Born at Malta, Dec. 6, 1775: died at Paris, March 23, 1818. A Maltese composer, usually known as Nicolo. Author of about 33 operas, among which are "Michel Ange" (1802), "Cendrillon" (1810), "Joconde" (1815), "Jeannot et Colin," etc.

Ispahan (is-pa-hän'), or Isfahan (is-fa-hän'). A city in the province of Irak-Ajemi, Persia, situated on the Zenderud in lat. 32° 39′ N., long. 51° 45′ E. The Great Mosque was built by Shah Abbas in the 16th century. The entrance to the mosque is by a keel-shaped arch set in a square panel adorned with inscriptions and arabesques in colored tiles. The archway is flanked by a double tier of lofty recessed arcades, and behind it rises a large pointed bulbous dome, whose surface is decorated with arabesques. Before the dome stand two slender cylindrical minarets, with a portico toward the top corbeled out to a great projection and crowned by cylindrical domed finials. The interior is arcaded in two tiers. The Bazar of the Tailors is a very rich and monumental example of Persian architecture. The architecture consists of wide and high corridors divided into bays by massive keel-shaped arches, and covered with domes on pendentives having open eyes for light at the top. The walls are ornamented with colored tiles, and the arches and balustrades over the square lateral booths are filled with geometric pierced openwork. The Caravansary of Amin Abad, on the road to Shiraz, is an octagonal hall with a central court. The gateway opens beneath a high keel-shaped arch which is flanked on each side by two superposed deeply recessed arches. The floor of the court, in the middle of which is a prayer-platform, is surrounded by chambers for travelers, behind which there is a vaulted corridor with quarters for beasts of burden. Ispahan manufactures fabrics, carpets, etc. It was captured by Tamerlane 1387; was the capital and an important city of 600,000 inhabitants in the 17th century; and was attacked by the Afghans in 1722. Population, estimated, 60,000.

Israel (iz'rā-el). [Heb., 'Soldier of God,' or 'God is a warrior.'] A name given to Jacob after successfully wrestling with the angel (Gen. xxxii. 28). Hence his descendants were called the people of Israel. See Jews.

Israel, The kingdom of the northern tribes of the Israelites who seceded from the southern tribes in the reign of Rehoboam, 953 B. C. (or perhaps about 975). Their first king was Jeroboam. Prominent succeeding kings were Ahab, Jehu, Joram, Jeroboam II., and Pekah. Elijah and Elisha belonged to the northern kingdom. Sargon, king of Assyria, captured Samaria, ended the kingdom, and carried a large part of the people into captivity in 722 or 721 B. C. Their ultimate fate has been the subject of much speculation, and they are frequently referred to as the lost tribes. They have been found in the Anglo-Saxons, the American Indians, etc. There seems to be no doubt, however, that some intermingled with the Assyrians, others returned to the southern kingdom, and still others are to be found in the scattered Jewish communities in Africa, Abyssinia, and elsewhere. Those remaining eventually united with Assyrian colonists and formed the Samaritans.

Israel in Egypt. An English oratorio by Handel, first performed April 4, 1739. The words are thought to have been selected by Handel himself from the Old Testament.

Israels (ēz-rā-āls'), Josef. Born at Groningen, 1824. A genre-painter of the Belgian school. He studied painting at Amsterdam under Kruseman, then went to Paris, where he worked in the atelier of Picot. His works have figured at the expositions of Paris, Brussels, and Rotterdam. He received a first-class medal at Paris in 1878, and a grand prix at the Exposition Universelle at Paris in 1889. Among his pictures are "Les domestics" (1868), "Retour" (1878), "Le pot au feu," and "Le jour de repos."

Israfeel, or Israfil (es-rā-fēl'). The angel of music. His voice is more melodious than that of any other creature. He is to sound the resurrection trumpet the last day. Koran.

Issachar (is'ą-kär). [Heb.; meaning doubtful.] 1. One of the patriarchs, son of Jacob and Leah. —2. One of the twelve tribes of Palestine, dwelling west of the Jordan, south of Zebulon, and north of Manasseh. The territory included the valley of Esdraelon.

Issik-Kul (is'ik-kŏl). A lake in the province of Semiryetchensk, central Asia, about lat. 42° 20′ N., long. 77° 30′ E. Length, 112 miles. Height above sea-level, 5,000 feet.

Issoire (ē-swär'). A town in the department of Puy-de-Dôme, France, situated on the Couze 19 miles south-southeast of Clermont. It was captured by the Protestants in 1574, and was destroyed by the Catholics in 1577. It contains a church of St. Paul. Population (1891), commune, 6,182.

Ister (is'ter). A Latin name of the Danube.

Isthmian games. See Isthmian sanctuary.

Isthmian sanctuary, The. A sanctuary in the Isthmus of Corinth, near the eastern mouth of the modern canal. It was the seat of the Isthmian games, which were celebrated every two years, and were second in importance only to those of Olympia. The sacred inclosure was strongly fortified in the time of Augustus, is roughly triangular in shape, about 660 feet from east to west, and somewhat more from north to south. Within it were the temples of Poseidon (Doric) and Palæmon (Ionic), portions of the architectured both of which have been recovered. The northern wall of the sanctuary coincides with the defensive wall crossing the Isthmus. Outside of the inclosure, to the south, lies the stadium, in which the chief exercises were held, and to the west is the Roman theater, close behind which was the Greek theater, and beyond the Sacred Vale, with temples to Demeter and Persephone, Artemis, and Bacchus. Almost all topographical knowledge of this historic sanctuary is based upon the exploration made in 1883 by the French School at Athens.

Italians (i-tal'yanz). 1. The primitive inhabitants of Italy. See the extract.

But whatever we make of the Etruscans, the rest of Italy in the older sense was held by various branches of an Aryan race nearly allied to the Greeks, whom we may call the Italians. Of this race there were two great branches. One of them, under various names, seems to have held all the southern part of the western coast of Italy, and to have spread into Sicily. Some of the tribes of this branch seem to have been almost as nearly akin to the Greeks as the Epeirots and other kindred nations on the east side of the Hadriatic. Of this branch of the Italian race, the most famous people were the Latins; and it was the growth of Latium, the border city of the Tiber against the Etruscans, the city of Romeon the Tiber, which became step by step, the mistress of Latium, of Italy, and of the Mediterranean world. The other branch, which held a much larger part of the peninsula, takingin the Sabines, Aquians, Volscians, Samnites, Lucanians, and other people who play a great part in Roman history, may perhaps be classed together as Aquians or Sacans, in distinction from the Latins and the other tribes allied to them. These tribes seem to have pressed from the eastern, the Hadriatic, coast of Italy, down upon the nations to the southwest of them, and to have largely extended their borders at their expense. Freeman, Hist. Geog., p. 45.

2. The inhabitants of Italy in general, ancient or modern.

Italian Molière, The. A surname sometimes given to Goldoni.

Protectorates: Abyssinia, Somaliland, Gallaland, Afar Country, etc.

The name of Italy has been used in several meanings at different times, but it has always meant either the whole or a part of the land which we now call Italy. The name gradually spread itself out from the extreme south to the north. At the time when our survey begins, the name did not go beyond the Lucanian or peninsular gulf, and indeed it hardly took in the whole of that. During the time of the Roman commonwealth Italy did not reach beyond the little rivers Macra and Rubicon, or Arno and Rubicon on the other side, near Ariminum. The land to the north, as far as the Alps, was not counted for Italy till after the time of Cæsar. Freeman, Hist. Geog., p. 45.

Northern Italy deserves its German appellation of Wallschland; for neither the Roman nor the Lombard conquest, nor the ravages of Goths, Huns, or Vandals, ever rooted out the offspring of those Gallic hordes which settled in the plain of the Po four centuries before our era. Freeman, Southern Italy, III. 255.

2. One of the four great prefectures in the later Roman Empire. It comprised the dioceses of Italy, Illyricum, and Africa, corresponding to Italy and neighboring islands, that part of the Austrian empire and Germany northward to the Danube, and nearly all the western part of the Roman possessions in Africa.

Iturbide (ē-tōr-bē'thā), Agustin de. Born at Valladolid (now Morelia), Sept. 27, 1783: died at Padilla, Tamaulipas, July 19, 1824. A Mexican revolutionist, afterward emperor. He was a colonel in the Spanish army, and in 1820 was in command of the forces operating against Guerrero in the south. On Feb. 24, 1821, he published at Iguala the celebrated manifesto known as the "Plan of Iguala," in which he proposed that Mexico should be made independent under a Spanish Bourbon prince. Guerrero and other leaders quickly adhered to this plan; the viceroy was forced to resign; and O'Donojú, who succeeded him, was induced to recognize the independence of Mexico in his sovereign's name. But Ferdinand VII. regarded the movement as a rebellion, and refused the crown which was offered to him. After much quarreling, Iturbide himself was proclaimed emperor May 19, 1822, and was crowned July 21. A strong opposition to him was quickly manifested. Santa Anna proclaimed a republic at Vera Cruz; an army of insurgents marched on Mexico; and in April, 1823, Iturbide was forced to resign. He was allowed to retire to Europe with a large pension, on condition that he should not return. Attempting to enter the country in May, 1824, he was arrested and shot.

Iturbide, Agustin de. Born 1863. Grandson of the emperor Iturbide. His mother was a native of the United States. In 1895 he was adopted by the emperor Maximilian, and made heir to the Mexican throne. After Maximilian's death he was taken to the United States, where he received part of his education. He is now (1894) an officer in the Mexican army.

Ivrea (ē-vrā'ā). A town in the province of Turin, Italy, situated on the Dora Baltea 29 miles north-northeast of Turin: the ancient Eporedia. It was a Roman colony; was for a time the capital of a marquisate of Ivrea; and was ceded to Savoy in 1248. It has a cathedral and castle. Population, commune, about 10,000.

Ivris (i-vrēs'), or Ibreez (i-brēz'). See the extract.

> More than a century ago a German traveller had observed two figures carved on a wall of rock near Ibreez, or Ivris, in the territory of the ancient Lykaonia. One of them was a god who carried in his hand a stalk of corn and a bunch of grapes: the other was a man who stood before the god in an attitude of adoration. Both figures were shod with boots with upturned ends, and the deity wore a tunic that reached to his knees, while on his head was a peaked cap ornamented with horn-like ribbons. A century elapsed before the sculpture was again visited by an European traveller, and it was again a German who found his way to the spot. On this occasion a drawing was made of the figures, which was published by Ritter in his great work on the geography of the world. But the drawing was poor and imperfect, and the first attempt to do adequate justice to the original was made by the Rev. E. J. Davis in 1875. He published the fact, and an account of the monument, in the Transactions of the Society of Biblical Archæology the following year. He had noticed that the figures were accompanied by what were known at the time as Hamathite characters. Three lines of these were inserted between the face of the god and his uplifted left hand, four lines more were engraved behind his worshipper, while below, on a level with an aqueduct which fed a mill, were yet other lines of half-obliterated hieroglyphs. It was plain that in Lykaonia also, where the old language of the country still lingered in the days of St. Paul, the Hittite system of writing had once been used.

After him the city first rose into prominence, and became the dominant power of the lake valley. Also Izcoatl, Itzcoatl, Izcoatl, etc.

Izdubar (iz-dō-bär'), also called Gilgamesh (gil-gä'mesh). The principal hero of certain ancient Babylonian legends. They are called the Babylonian "Nimrod Epic," because Izdubar was considered the prototype of Nimrod, who is mentioned in Genesis x. The exploits of Izdubar are briefly as follows: Erech (Orchoe of the Greeks, modern Warka), the capital of Shinar (Shumir), had been governed by Dungu (Dammuz, Adonis), the husband of Ishtar. After his tragic death it was subjected by the Elamite invaders. In this emergency Izdubar comes from his native place, Marad, to Erech, and with the help of the demigod Ea-bani kills the last Elamite usurper, Khumbaba, and delivers Erech. Thereupon Ishtar offers him her love and hand, but is roughly rejected by him and reminded of her former amours, which brought only ruin and death to the lovers. The insulted goddess cries to her father Anu for revenge. Anu creates a monstrous bull and sends it against Erech, but the animal is easily killed by Izdubar with the assistance of his friend Ea-bani. At last Ishtar prevails on her mother Anatu to smite Ea-bani with death, and Izdubar with a loathsome disease, a kind of leprosy. To get rid of his malady and to bring back his friend to life, Izdubar decides to seek for his ancestor Hasisadra, who was translated to the seat of the blessed and enjoyed there immortality with the gods. After many adventures he reaches him. Hasisadra describes to him the deluge which once took place, and how he with his friends was saved in a ship that he had built at the advice of the god Ea, and then cures him of his disease. Izdubar thereupon returns to Erech, and upon his lamentation for Ea-bani the gods grant the latter the privilege of returning from the under world.

Iztaccihuatl (ēs-täk-sē-hwät'l), or Ixtaccihuatl. [Nahuatl, from iztac, white, and cihuatl, woman.] A volcano in Mexico, north of Popocatepetl. Height, 16,060 feet. The name originated on the west side, where the mountain bears some resemblance to a woman lying extended in a white shroud.

A district in the Jabalpur division, intersected by lat. 23° N., long. 78° E. Area, 3,918 square miles. Population (1881), 687,233.—3. The capital of the district of Jabalpur, about lat. 23° 10′ N., long. 80° 3′ E. It is an important trading center. Population, including cantonment (1891), 84,480.

Jabbah (jab′bä). [Ar. iklil al-jebah, crown of the forehead.] The fine triple star ν Scorpii, of the fourth magnitude.

Jabbok (jab′ok). In Bible geography, a mountain stream of Gilead, Palestine, joining the Jordan about 25 miles north of the Dead Sea: the modern Zurka. Length, about 50 miles.

Jabesh, or Jabesh-Gilead (jā′besh-gil′ē-ad). [Heb., 'dry.'] In Bible geography, an important town in Gilead, Palestine. Its situation has not been identified.

Jabez (jā′bez). A person mentioned in 1 Chron. iv. 9, 10 as more honorable than his brethren.

Jabin (jā′bin). [Heb., 'intelligent.'] In Old Testament history: (a) A king of Hazor in Palestine, defeated by Joshua by the waters of Merom. Josh. xi. 1–3. (b) A king of Hazor, whose general, Sisera, was defeated by Barak. Judges iv. The accounts of these two kings and their overthrow are very much alike, and probably relate to the same person and event.

Jablunka (yäb-lön′kä) Pass. A pass across the Carpathians in Austria-Hungary. It connects the head waters of the Oder in Silesia with those of the Waag in Hungary, and is traversed by a railway. Height, 1,970 feet.

Jabne (jab′ne), or Jabneel (jab′ne-el or jab′nē-el), later Jamnia (jam′ni-ạ or jam-nī′ạ). A Philistine city which fell to the lot of the tribe of Dan, situated between Joppa and Ashdod, about an hour distant from the Mediterranean: the modern village of Yebna or Ibna. It was conquered by the Maccabeans; given by Augustus to Herod; and by the will of Salome, sister of Herod, became private property of the imperial house, but was destined to play an important part in Jewish history. During the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans, Titus granted permission to Jochanan ben Zaccai to establish there a Talmudic school. After the fall of Jerusalem a Sanhedrim was also constituted, and Jabne became for centuries the center and nursery of the religious and national life of the dispersed Jewish community.

Jaboatão (zhä-bwä-tãñ′), Antonio de Santa Maria. Born near Pernambuco, 1695; died after 1761. A Brazilian Franciscan author. He occupied various posts in his order, of which he was chronicler in Brazil. His most important work is the "Orbe seraphico Novo Brasilico" (Part I, Lisbon, 1761; Part II, Rio de Janeiro, 1859). It is a history of the Seraphic Franciscans in Brazil, and contains much of general interest.

Jaca (hä′kä). A town in the province of Huesca, Spain, situated on the Aragon 66 miles north-northeast of Saragossa. It has a cathedral, and was formerly important.

Jachin (jā′kin). [Heb., '(God) establishes.'] 1. The fourth son of Simeon. Gen. xlvi. 10.—2. A priest, head of the 21st course, in the time of David.—3. A column set up in the court of Solomon's temple. Its companion was named Boaz.

The two pillars, Jachin and Boaz, were regarded as Hiram's chef d'œuvres, but were constructed, probably, in several pieces. The shafts, the capitals, and the bases were certainly distinct, and it is not certain that even the shafts were in one piece. The wonderfulness of the pillars was in their ornamentation rather than in their construction. Each was adorned with "chain-work" and "checker-work" (I Kings vii. 17), with "nets" and with "pomegranates," two hundred of these, in two rows, being embossed on either column (I Kings vii. 42).

Jachmann (yäch′män). Eduard Karl Emanuel. Born at Dantzic, Prussia, March 2, 1822; died at Oldenburg, Oct. 23, 1887. A German vice-admiral. He defeated the Danes near Jasmund March 17, 1864. He became president of the ministry of marine in 1867, and vice-admiral in 1868, and was commander-in-chief in the North Sea 1870–71.

Jack (jak). Captain. See the extract.

Another ally appeared at the camp. This was a personage long known in Western fireside story as Captain Jack, the Black Hunter, or the Black Rifle. It was said of him that, having been a settler on the fardels of frontier, in the valley of the Juniata, he returned one evening to his cabin and found it burned to the ground by Indians, and the bodies of his wife and children lying among the ruins. He vowed undying vengeance, raised a band of kindred spirits, dressed and painted like Indians, and became the scourge of the red man and the champion of the white. But he and his wild crew, useful as they might have been, shocked Braddock's sense of military fitness; and he received them so coldly that they left him.
Parkman, Montcalm and Wolfe, I. 204.

Jack, Colonel. See Colonel Jack.

Jack and Jill. An English nursery song. Jill or Gill is an abbreviation of the once common feminine name Gillian or Julian (L. Juliana). In Icelandic mythology, Jack and Jill are two children kidnapped by the moon, while drawing water, which is carried on their shoulders in a bucket suspended from a pole. The Swedish peasants still account for the moon-spots in this way. A play with this title was popular at the English court between 1567 and 1578.

Jack and the Bean-stalk. An English nursery tale, founded on a world-wide myth. It is found among the Zulus of South Africa and the North American Indians, as well as among the races of Aryan descent.

Jack and the Bean-stalk may be added to the series of English nursery tales derived from the Teutonic. The bean-stalk is a descendant of the wonderful ash in the "Edda." Halliwell, Nursery Rhymes, p. 175.

Jack the Giant-killer. The hero of a nursery legend. The story was originally in Walter Map's book, and he obtained it from France in the early part of the 12th century. It was translated into Armoric, and translated into Latin by Geoffrey of Monmouth.

Jack Brag. A novel by Theodore Hook, published in 1837. Jack Brag is a vulgar braggart who contrives to get into good society.

Jack Horner. An old nursery rime, the hero of which "sat in a corner eating his Christmas pie." It is one of the oldest of this class of rimes. A copy of his "pleasant history" is to be found in the Bodleian Library, which is in substance much the same as "The Boy and the Gray" published in London 1647. Halliwell says "both are from the more ancient 'Jack and his Step-dame,' printed by Mr. Wright."

Jack-in-the-Green. A puppet character in the English May-day games.

Jackson. A city and the capital of Jackson County, Michigan, situated on the Grand River 75 miles west of Detroit. It has flourishing manufactures and trade. Population (1890), 20,798.

Jackson. The capital of Mississippi and of Hinds County, situated on the Pearl River in lat. 32° 18′ N., long. 90° 8′ W. It exports cotton. Here, May 14, 1863, the Federals under Grant defeated the Confederates under J. E. Johnston. Federal loss, 300; Confederate, 845. Population (1890), 5,920.

Jackson, Andrew. Born at the Waxhaw settlement, N. C. (?), March 15, 1767: died at the Hermitage, near Nashville, Tenn., June 8, 1845. The seventh President of the United States (1829–37). He was member of Congress from Tennessee 1796–97; United States senator 1797–98; justice of the supreme Court of Tennessee 1798–1804; defeated the Creeks at Talladega in 1813, and at Emuckfau, and Horseshoe Bend in 1814; captured Pensacola from the English in 1814; defeated the English under Sir Edward Pakenham at New Orleans Jan. 8, 1815; commanded against the Seminoles 1817–18; was appointed governor of Florida in 1821; was United States senator from Tennessee 1823–25; was an unsuccessful candidate for President in 1824; was elected as the Democratic candidate for President in 1828; and was reelected in 1832. He inaugurated the "spoils system" in Federal politics by dismissing about 690 office-holders during the first year of his administration, as against 74 removals by all the preceding Presidents. In July, 1832, he vetoed a bill rechartering the Bank of the United States. He published, Dec. 10, 1832, a proclamation in answer to the nullification ordinance passed by South Carolina Nov. 24, 1832, declaring void certain obnoxious duties on imports. In this proclamation he announced his intention of enforcing the Federal laws, and ordered United States troops to Charleston and Augusta, with the result that the nullifiers submitted.

Jackson, Charles Thomas. Born at Plymouth, Mass., June 21, 1805; died at Somerville, Mass., Aug. 29, 1880. An American geologist and physicist. He graduated at the Harvard Medical School in 1829, and after having completed his studies abroad practised medicine for a time at Boston. He eventually abandoned medicine, and in 1838 opened a laboratory at Boston for instruction in practical chemistry. He became State geologist of Maine in 1836, and of Rhode Island in 1839, and in 1847 was appointed by Congress to survey the mineral lands of Michigan. He constructed in 1834 a telegraphic apparatus similar to that patented by Morse in 1835, and in 1852 he received a prize from the French Academy for the discovery of etherization.

An American poet, novelist, and miscellaneous writer. In 1884 she was appointed special commissioner to examine into the condition of the Mission Indians of California. Among her works are "Mercy Philbrick's Choice" (1876), "Hetty" (Strange Holiness) (1877), "A Century of Dishonor, etc." (1881), and "Ramona" (1884). She also published several volumes of poems, tales, "Bits of Talk," etc.

Jackson, John. Born in Yorkshire, England, 1778: died at London, June 1, 1831. An English portrait-painter, a friend of Wilkie and Haydon. One of his best works is the portrait of Canova exhibited at the Royal Academy in 1818.

Jackson, Thomas Jonathan, commonly called Stonewall Jackson. Born at Clarksburg, W. Va., Jan. 21, 1824: died at Chancellorsville, Va., May 10, 1863. A noted Confederate general in the American Civil War. He graduated at West Point in 1846; served as a lieutenant in the Mexican war; and resigned from the army in 1851, when he became professor of philosophy and artillery tactics in Virginia Military Institute. He joined the Confederate army at the beginning of the Civil War, and served as a brigadier-general at the first battle of Bull Run, July 21, 1861. Having at a critical period in this engagement been sent forward to restore the battle on the Confederate left, he maintained an exposed position against great odds until the broken forces were enabled to rally. In rallying his troops General Bernard E. Bee cried: "See, there is Jackson standing like a stone wall! Rally on the Virginians!" (whence the subsequent Stonewall Jackson). He was promoted major-general in Nov., 1861; was defeated by General Shields near Winchester, March 23, 1862; defeated General Banks at Winchester, May 25, 1862; fought an indecisive battle with General Fremont at Cross Keys, June 8, 1862; commanded a corps at the battles of Gaines's Mill, June 27, and Malvern Hill, July 1, 1862; defeated General Banks at Cedar Mountain, Virginia, Aug. 9, 1862; captured Harper's Ferry, Sept. 15, 1862; participated in the battle of Antietam, Sept. 17, 1862; commanded the right wing at Fredericksburg, Dec. 13, 1862; was promoted lieutenant-general; and was mortally wounded by his own men at the battle of Chancellorsville on the evening of May 2, 1863, as he was returning from a reconnaissance beyond the lines.

Jackson, William. Born at Exeter, May 28, 1730: died there, July 12, 1803. An English musical composer, known as Jackson of Exeter. He wrote "The Lord of the Manor" (an opera, 1780), "The Metamorphosis" (1776), and much church music, settings for poems, songs, etc., and several volumes of madrigals, canzonets, etc.

Jackson, William. Born at Masham, Yorkshire, Jan. 9, 1815: died at Bradford, April 15, 1866. An English musical composer. Besides a number of hymns and chants, he wrote "The Deliverance of Israel, etc." (an oratorio, produced in 1845), "Isaiah" (an oratorio, 1850), songs, and a good deal of sacred music. His last work, "The Praise of Music," was composed for the Bradford festival (1866). He did not live to conduct it.

Jack Sprat. An English nursery rime.

Few children's rhymes are more common than those relating to Jack Sprat and his wife, "Jack Sprat could eat no fat," etc.; but it is little thought they have been current for two centuries. Such, however, is the fact, and when Howell published his Collection of Proverbs in 1659, p. 20, the story related to no less exalted a personage than an archdeacon.

"Archdeacon Pratt would eat no fat,
His wife would eat no lean:
'Twixt Archdeacon Pratt and Joan his wife,
The meat was eat up clean."

Halliwell, Nursery Rhymes.

Jack Tier. A novel by Cooper, published in 1848. It is a recasting of "The Red Rover."

Jack Upland. An attack on friars, in prose, added by Speght to Chaucer's works in his 1602 edition, but evidently not Chaucer's.

Jacob (jā'kob). [L. Jacobus, Sp. Pg. Jacobo, It. Jacopo, Giacobo, G. Dan. Sw. Jakob (in Vernacular F. Jacques, Jaques, whence E. Jack), from LL. Jacobus, Gr. Ἰακώβ, Heb. Ya'aḳobh, of uncertain origin, but explained as 'supplanter.' See James.] The son of Isaac and Rebekah, and twin brother of Esau; father of the twelve patriarchs, and ancestor of the Israelites. The date of his immigration into Egypt is given by Brugsch as about 1730 B. C.

A kind of synonym of Israel was Jakobel, "He whom El rewards," or "He who follows El, who marches step by step in the ways that He has traced." This name was abridged to Jacob, as that of Ishmael was to Ishum, or Talbel to Caleb. Beni-Jacob or Beni-Israel was the name of the tribe; and in course of time Jacob was taken to be a living person, grandson of Abraham.

Renan, Hist. of the People of Israel, I. 90.

Jacobabad (jā'kob-a-bad'). [Jacob's city,' named from Gen. John Jacob, 1847.] A town and military station in Sind, British India, about lat. 28° 14' N., long. 68° 28' W.

Jacotot (zhä-kō-tō'), Jean Joseph. Born at Dijon, France, March 4, 1770; died at Paris, July, 1840. A French educator, professor of the French language and literature at Louvain 1818–40. He devised a method of instruction which is described in his "L'Enseignement universel" (1823).

His method of teaching is based on three principles: 1. All men have an equal intelligence; 2. Every man has received from God the faculty of learning by instructing himself; 3. Every thing is in every thing. The first of these principles is certainly wrong, although Jacotot tried to explain it by asserting that, although men had the same intelligence, they differed widely in the will to make use of it. Still, it is important to assert that nearly all men are capable of learning some intellectual education provided the studies to which they are directed are wide enough to engage their faculties, and the means taken to interest them are sufficiently ingenious. The second principle lays down that it is not necessary to stimulate the pupil to learn for himself than to teach him didactically. The third principle explains the process which Jacotot adopted, the learning a language for the first time he would give a short passage of a few lines, and encourage the pupil to study first the words, then the letters, then the grammar, and the full meaning of the expressions, until by iteration and accretion a single paragraph took the place of an entire literature. Encyc. Brit., VII. 677.

Jacquard (zhä-kär'), Joseph Marie. Born at Lyons, July 7, 1752; died at Oullins, near Lyons, Aug. 7, 1834. A French mechanic, inventor of the Jacquard loom about 1801.

Jaimini (jī'mi-ni). A Hindu saint and philosopher, said to have been the pupil of Vyasa, to have received from him the Samavedas, and to have founded the Purvamimansa school of Hindu philosophy.

Jainas (jī'näz), or Jains (jinz). [From Skt. jina, the victorious one.] A Hindu sect which numbers about 380,000, at least half of whom are in the Bombay Presidency. They are the followers of Jina, the 'victorious,' as the Buddhists of Buddha, the 'awakened.' A Jina was a sage who has reached omniscience, and who comes to reestablish the corrupted law. There have been 24 Jinas, as Buddha had 24 predecessors. They succeeded each other at immense intervals, their stature and term of life always decreasing. Like the Buddhas, the Jinas became deities. They have gods-see, Shrāmanās, who associate in monastic communals. Their images, sometimes colossal, especially in the Deccan, are numerous in the sanctuaries, which are almost all of a distinctive and elegant type. Next to the Jinas stand their immediate disciples, the Ganadharas, worshiped as guardian saints, and many deities borrowed from the Hindu pantheon, but who do not share the regular cultus. This cultus is akin to the Buddhist in having the same offerings and acts of faith and homage. Both use little bells. In both women have the same rights as men, and both practise confession, value pilgrimages, and abstain from mouths of the year especially to fasting, reading their Scriptures, and meditation. The Jainas, like the Buddhists, reject the Veda as corrupt, to which they oppose their own Agamas as the true Veda. They have no sacerdotal caste. They observe the rules of caste among themselves, but without attaching to them religious significance. They have promoted literature and science, especially astronomy, grammar, and romantic literature. Like the Buddhists they are divided into a clerical body and a lay (Vatis, 'ascetics,' and Shrāvakās, 'hearers'), but the monastic institution is less developed. They have two principal sects: the Shvetambaras, 'having white garments,' and the Digambaras, 'those having the air as their garment,' who go naked—designations applied to both sects by half only. The first have the highest rank, but the second are more ancient. Both sects go back perhaps to the 5th century A.D. They are rather rivals than enemies. Another division is that into Northern and Southern Jainas, which, originally geographical, has extended to the canon and the entire body of traditions and usages. The Digambara Vatis may practise nudity only at their meals when these are taken in common. No Hindu sect is more rigorous in respect for and abstinence from everything that has life, though the Southern Jainas frequently practised religious suicide in the middle ages. The general doctrine of the Jainas is nearly like that of the Buddhists. They are atheists. The world is eternal. They deny the possibility of a perfect being existing from all eternity. The Jina became perfect. As the Buddhists have their Adibuddha, the Jainas have also returned to a sort of deism by their Jinapuja, or supreme adoration. They are animate and inanimate. Animate beings are composed of soul and body, and their souls are eternal—a point of deviation from Buddhism. Not a sequence that life is evil to the Jainas, but Nirvana is for them not annihilation, but entrance into endless blessedness. The Jina reveals the means, the Triratna, the 'three jewels,' perfect faith in the father of the sons, of whom the most renowned was Parshvanatha, the Mahabharata and Vishnu Purana contain various legends regarding him.

Jamaica (ja-mā'kā). An island of the Greater Antilles, West Indies, belonging to Great Britain, situated in the Caribbean Sea 90 miles south of the eastern part of Cuba. Capital, Kingston. The surface is generally mountainous, the Blue Mountains in the east rising to 7,360 feet. The island has abundant valuable and some mineral resources. The chief exports are sugar, rum, coffee, fruits, dye-woods, etc. Jamaica is a crown colony, with a governor, privy council, and legislative assembly. It was discovered by Columbus May 4, 1494; was settled by the Spaniards in 1509; and was conquered by the English in 1655. Jambudvipa (jam-bu-dwē'pä). A name of India in Sanskrit poetry, and restricted to India in Buddhist writings, but strictly a poetical name for the whole earth, of which India was thought to be the most important part. In the Mahabharata the world is divided into seven circular dvipas, or continents, of which Jambudvipa is the first, surrounded respectively by seven oceans in concentric belts, the mountain Meru, or abode of the gods, being in the center of Jambudvipa, which again is divided into nine Varshas, or countries separated by eight ranges of mountains, the Varsha called Bharata (India) lying south of the Himavat (Himalaya) range. Jambudvipa is so named from the jambu (rose-apple) trees which abound in it, or from an enormous jambu tree on Mount Meru.

Jamburg (yäm'börg). A town in the government of St. Petersburg, Russia, situated on the Luga 68 miles southwest of St. Petersburg. Population, 4,288.

James (jāmz). [The E. name James, dial. also Jemes (whence colloq. Jem and Jem), is from ME. James, also Jame, from OF. James, another form of Jaques, Jacques, from LL. Jacobus, Jacob. See Jacob.] There are several persons of this name who hold an important place in New Testament history. (1) The son of Zebedee and brother of the apostle John. Of Galilean birth, he was called to be a disciple of Jesus and an apostle. He was killed by Herod Agrippa (A. D. 44) and is the only apostle whose martyrdom the Scriptures relate. According to one legend, he traveled and preached in Spain; according to another, his body was miraculously conveyed to Compostella, in Spain, and worshiped there. (2) "James the Lord's brother," author of the "Epistle of James." He is described as holding office in the church at Jerusalem, and appears to have been president of the council that met there in A. D. 50. He is also called "James the less" (or "the little") (Mark xv. 40), and in early church history "James the Just." (3) An apostle, distinguished as "James the son of Alpheus," identified by many with "James the Lord's brother."

James, The General Epistle of. A New Testament epistle, written by "James the Lord's brother." It was written from Jerusalem, and is addressed to the twelve tribes of the Dispersion. Its main object is to inculcate practical piety and good works.

James I. Born at Dunfermline, 1394: died Feb. 20, 1437. King of Scotland 1406–37, son of Robert III. and Annabella Drummond. He was captured by the English while on his way to France, and was detained in England 18 years. He married one of the great feudatories with the assistance of the clergy and the burghs; and on Feb. 22, 14-2, stabbed with his own hand the Earl of Douglas, who had entered into a treasonable alliance with the Earls of Crawford and Athole. The latter two were seized to Stirling by a safe-conduct. He was accidentally killed by a wedge from a bombard at the siege of Roxburgh.

James III. Born July 10, 1451: died June 11, 1488. King of Scotland 1460–88, son of James II. and Mary of Gueldres. He favored men of inferior rank to the neglect of the great feudal houses, which provoked a rising of the latter under his son James. He was defeated by the rebels at Sauchieburn, June 11, 1488, and was killed in the flight.

James IV. Born March 17, 1473: died Sept. 9, 1513. King of Scotland 1488–1513, son of James III. and Margaret, daughter of Christian I. of Denmark. He headed the rebellious nobles who defeated and killed his father at Sauchieburn, June 11, 1488. On June 11, 1488, He maintained peaceful relations with Henry VII. of England, whose daughter Margaret he married in 1502: but was forced by the aggressive attitude of Henry VIII. to seek an offensive alliance with France. He was defeated and killed by the Earl of Surrey at Flodden Field, Sept. 9, 1513, during an invasion of England in Henry's absence in France.

James V. Born at Linlithgow, April 10, 1512: died Dec. 16, 1542. King of Scotland 1513–42, son of James IV. and Margaret, daughter of Henry VII. of England. During his minority the regency was conducted first by his mother, and afterward by the Duke of Albany. He accomplished the conquest of the royal prerogatives in 1528. He was a vigorous administrator, protected the poor against oppression from the nobles, and united freely with the commons, sometimes under the incognito of "the Gudeman of Ballinbreich," whence he is often called "the king of the commons." He became involved in war with England in 1542, and suffered the loss of an army under Sinclair at Solway Moss, Nov. 25, 1542.

James I. Born in Edinburgh Castle, June 19, 1566: died at Theobalds, March 27, 1625. King of England, Scotland, and Ireland 1603–25, son of Lord Darnley and Mary Queen of Scots. He became, on the abdication of his mother, king of Scotland as James VI. July 24, 1567; and by virtue of his descent, both through his father and his mother, from Margaret Tudor, daughter of Henry VII., succeeded to the English throne on the death of Elizabeth without issue, March 24, 1603, being crowned king of England (and Ireland) July 25, 1603. He was a learned but pedantic, weak, and incapable monarch, whence he was aptly characterized by the Duc de Sully as the "wisest fool in Europe." In domestic politics he sought to assert the theory of the divine right of kingship and of episcopacy; in his foreign relations he strove to maintain peace at all hazards, even to the prejudice of his natural allies, the Protestant powers on the Continent. He presided, in 1604, over the Hampton Court Conference between the bishops and the Puritans, at which the latter sought but failed to obtain a relaxation of the laws directed against nonconformists. In the same year he concluded peace with Spain, with which he had inherited a war from his predecessor in England; and appointed a commission to revise the English translation of the Bible, which commission completed the so-called King James version in 1611. He sanctioned in 1604 penal laws of increased severity against the Roman Catholics in consequence of the discovery of the Gunpowder Plot (which see) in the preceding year, and granted a patent organizing the London and Plymouth companies, the former of which founded the settlement of James-town in 1607, while a band of English separatists under Holland settled, without authority, the settlement of Plymouth in the territory of the latter in 1620. Another important event which took place in his reign was the restoration of episcopacy in Scotland. He began in 1611 negotiations for the marriage of his eldest son Charles with a Spanish princess; and in the same year entered into a defensive alliance with the Protestant Union in Germany, which was followed in 1613 by the marriage of his daughter Elizabeth to the elector palatine Frederick V., head of the union. He refused to assist his son-in-law in the struggle with the emperor Ferdinand II. for the crown of Bohemia (see Frederick IV., elector palatine; Ferdinand II., emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, and Thirty Years' War); and after the defeat of Frederick by the Imperialists on the White Hill, and the invasion of the Palatinate by the Spanish troops in 1620, sought by futile negotiations to induce Philip III. of Spain to restore Frederick in the electorate and to cause him to relinquish, in answer to a rebuke from the king for meddling in affairs of state by sending in a petition against popery and the proposed Spanish marriage, Parliament packed. Dec. 18, 1621, the Great Protestation, declaring that affairs which concerned the king and the realm were proper subjects for debate in Parliament. The king tore the page containing the protestation from the journal of the Commons. In 1623 he reluctantly permitted Charles and the Duke of Buckingham to depart for Spain to conclude the negotiations for a marriage treaty which had been kept up, with interruptions, since 1611; but as Philip was unwilling to procure the restoration of the Palatinate, Charles and the duke returned in the same year, and the negotiations were finally abandoned.

James II. Born at St. James's Palace, Oct. 14, 1633; died at St. Germain, Sept. 6, 1701. King of England, Scotland, and Ireland 1685–88, son of Charles I. and Henrietta Maria. Before his accession he was known as the Duke of York. He became lord high admiral of England on the accession of his brother Charles II. in 1660; received a grant of the New Netherlands in 1664; embraced the Roman Catholic faith privately before 1672; and was forced by the Test Act to resign the admiralty in 1673. Under the guidance of Father Petre, his confessor and chief adviser, he aimed on his accession to make himself an absolute monarch and to restore the Roman Catholic church. He increased the standing army from 6,000 to about 30,000 men by keeping up the military force raised to suppress Scottish rebellion under the Duke of Monmouth in 1685, and granted commissions in the new regiments to Roman Catholics. He published a declaration of liberty of conscience for all denominations in England and Scotland in April, 1687, and April 25, 1688, ordered the declaration to be read in all the churches. A petition from the primate and six bishops against the order was pronounced a seditious libel by the king, who sent the seven bishops to the Tower and brought them to trial before the Court of King's Bench. The trial resulted in acquittal June 30, 1688, and the same day an invitation, signed by the Earls of Danby, Devonshire, and Shrewsbury, the Bishop of London, and others, was despatched to William of Orange to save England from a Roman Catholic tyranny. William landed at Torbay Nov. 5, 1688, and Dec. 23 James escaped to France, where he was assigned the château of St. Germain by Louis XIV. as a place of refuge. In 1689 he made a descent on Ireland, but was totally defeated by William at the battle of the Boyne, July 1, 1689.

James. A river in Virginia, formed near the border of Botetourt and Alleghany counties by the union of the Jackson and Cowpasture rivers, and flowing by an estuary into Chesapeake Bay near Old Point Comfort. It played an important strategic part in the Civil War. Length, about 450 miles; navigable to Richmond (150 miles).

James IV. A play by Robert Greene. It was written about 1590, but was not printed until 1598. The whole title is "The Scottish History of James IV., slain at Flodden." It contains a fairy interlude in which Oberon appears. Judge assigns the scene in the play.

James, Henry. Born at New York, April 15, 1843. An American novelist and critic, son of Henry James. He was educated principally in Europe, and studied law at Harvard. He began to contribute to periodicals in 1866. Since 1869 he has lived mostly in England. Among his works are "Transatlantic Sketches" (1875), "A Passionate Pilgrim, etc." (1875), "The American" (1877), "The Europeans" (1878), "French Poets and Novelists" (1878), "Daisy Miller" (1878), "Hawthorne" (English men of letters, 1879), "Confidence" (1880), "Portrait of a Lady" (1881), "Daisy Miller" (a comedy, 1882), "A Little Tour in France" (1884), "The Author of Beltraffio" (1885), "The Bostonians" (1886), "Princess Casamassima" (1886), "Partial Portraits" (1888), "The Real Thing, etc." (1893).

James, John Angell. Born at Blandford, Dorset, England, June 6, 1785; died at Birmingham, Oct., 1859. An English congregational clergyman and religious writer. His best-known work is "The Anxious Inquirer."

James, Thomas. Born about 1593; died about 1635. An English navigator. On May 3, 1631, he sailed from Bristol in the Henrietta Maria to discover the northwest passage, and in August entered Hudson's Strait. He reached Greenland in June, and sailed on to Hudson Bay, where he wintered. He reached England Oct. 22, 1632.

James, William. Died at London, May 28, 1827. A British writer on naval history. From 1801 to 1813 he was an attorney of the supreme court of Jamaica, and proctor in the vice-admiralty court. In 1812 he was in the United States, and on his return to England, in March, 1816, he published "An Enquiry into the Merits of the Principal Naval Actions between Great Britain and the United States." In 1817 this pamphlet was enlarged as "A Full and Correct Account of the Chief Naval Occurrences of the Late War between Great Britain and the United States of America." He also published "The Naval History of Great Britain from the Declaration of War by France in 1793 to the Accession of George IV." (1822–24; second edition 1826). It is the standard work on the subject.

Jameson (jā'me-son), Mrs. (Anna Brownell Murphy). Born at Dublin, May 17, 1794; died at Ealing, Middlesex, March 17, 1860. An Irish writer, the eldest daughter of D. Brownell Murphy, an Irish miniature-painter. From the age of 16 to 20 she was governess in the family of the Marquis of Winchester. About 1823 she entered upon the same service in the family of Mr. Littleton, afterward Lord Hatherton. Her journal was published anonymously as "A Lady's Diary," and then as "The Diary of an Ennuyee" in 1826. In 1825 she married Robert Jameson, afterward vice-chancellor of Upper Canada, soon separated, Jameson going as judge to Jamaica. Her "Characteristics of Women" appeared in 1832. In 1841 she began the series of art-works which made her famous with a "Companion to the Public Picture Galleries of London." She traveled extensively in Europe and America, and in 1847 revisited Italy to write her "Memoirs of the Early Italian Painters" (1845), and "Miscellaneous Essays," chiefly artistic (1846).

Jameson, James Sligo. Born at Alloa, Clackmannanshire, Aug. 17, 1856; died at Bangala on the Kongo, Aug. 17, 1888. A British naturalist and explorer. He visited Borneo in 1877, South Africa in 1878, the Rocky Mountains in 1882, and Spain and Algeria in 1884. On Jan. 20, 1887, he became the naturalist of the Emin Pasha Relief Expedition under Henry M. Stanley, reaching Lake Albert Nyanza in June. He left as second in command of the rear column under Major Bartelot, and at Stanley Falls in 1888 witnessed the killing of a child by the comrade of Tippu Tib.

Jameson, Robert. Born at Leith, July 11, 1774; died at Edinburgh, April 19, 1854. A Scottish mineralogist. In 1798 he published the "Mineralogy of the Shetland Islands and of Arran," and in 1800 "Mineralogy of the Scottish Isles." In 1800 he went to Freiburg to study with Werner, and in 1804 was appointed regius professor of natural history at Edinburgh.

Jami (jä-mē'). Born 1411: died 1492. A celebrated Persian poet. His name was Nuruddin Abdurrahman, but he is known as Jami from his birthplace, Jam in Khorasan. He began his career as a general student, but later devoted himself especially to the philosophy of the Sufis under the Sheik ul Islam Saududdin whom he succeeded. He was the last great poet and mystic of Persia, and is said to be the author of 99 works in both prose and verse. "The Seven Thrones" is thought by a native critic to combine the most exquisite compositions in the Persian language. The seven comprise: (1) "Five Poems" of Nizami. The 7 poems thus termed are "The Chain of Gold," "Salaman and Absal," "The Present of the Just," "The Mirror of Secrets," "Laila and Majnun," "Yusuf and Zulaikha," and "The Book of Alexander." Other works are a "Spring Garden" (i. e. a book on ethics containing anecdotes and fables written in both prose and verse), the "Magazine of Secrets," and a biography of the Sufis entitled "Exhalations of Intimacy or of Holiness." He was buried at Herat, the sultans of which were his patrons.

Jamshid (Pers. pron. jem-shēd'). In Firdausi, the fourth king of the Pishdadian or earliest dynasty. He reigned 700 years, the first 300 of which were happy and beneficent. He softened iron and taught its use in the arts, taught weaving, distinguished castes, subdued and employed the devs or demons, learned various stone-cutting materials, invented medicine, and first practised navigation. In his homage men first celebrated the New Year. Death, was unknown, but Jamshid became proud and forgot God. He was driven before Dahak (see Azhi Dahaka), and remained concealed 100 years, when he appeared on the shore of the china sea only to be seized and sawn asunder by Dahak. Jamshid is also known as Yima-khsaeta, 'shining Yima' (see Yima), Sanskrit Yama (see Yama).

Jamu (jum-ö'), or Jummoo (jum-mö'). A town in Kashmir, situated on the Tavi in lat. 32° 44′ N., long. 74° 54′ E. Population, about 8,000.

Janaka (jan'a-ka). In Hindu legend: 1. A king of Mithila, of the solar race. When Nimi died without a successor, the sages rubbed his body and produced from it a prince "called Janaka, from being born without a progenitor." He was the first Janaka, 20 generations earlier than Janaka the father of Sita.

2. King of Videha, and father of Sita. He was remarkable for his knowledge and sanctity. The sage Yajnavalkya was his priest. He refused to submit to the pretensions of the Brahmans, and asserted his right of performing sacrifices. He succeeded in his contest, for it is said that by his righteous life he became a Brahman and Rajarshi.

Janamejaya (jan-a-mā'ja-ya). In Hindu legend, a king, son of Parikshit and great-grandson of Arjuna. He listened to the Mahabharata, as recited by Vaishampayana, and so expiated the sin of killing a Brahman.

Janauschek (yä-nou-shek'), Fanny (originally Franziska Magdalena Romance). Born at Prague, Bohemia, July 20, 1830. A Bohemian tragic actress. She made her first appearance at Prague, and in 1847 was engaged at the theater at Cologne. The next year she went to Frankfort, where she remained for 12 years. She came to the United States in 1863, and played Japan (ja-pan'). [Corrupted from Zipangu (of Marco Polo), corrupted from native Nihon or Nippon, Land of the Rising Sun: F. Japon, Sp. Japon, G. and D. Japan, Pg. Japão.] An empire of Asia, lying in the Pacific east of China, Corea, and Siberia. Capital, Tokio. It comprises four principal islands — the main island (Hondshu, Yezo, Shikoku, and Kiushiu, with about 1,000 small islands, including the Loochoo and Kurile groups. The surface is mountainous and hilly, culminating in Fujisan (12,365 feet). The leading occupation is agriculture. The chief exports are silk, tea, rice, coal, copper, fish, lacquer, etc. The administrative divisions are 3 fu and 43 ken (or prefectures). There is also a subdivision politically into 8 provinces. The government is hereditary monarchy, with an emperor, cabinet and privy council, and an Imperial Parliament composed of a House of Peers and a House of Representatives. The prevailing religions are Shintoism and Buddhism. Authentic history begins about 500 A. D. Corean influence began at an early date, and Buddhism was introduced from Corea about 550. The shogun Yoritomo usurped the authority in 1192. Marco Polo visited the islands in the 13th century. A system of feudal baronage grew up: the Mikados were the emperors, but the real power belonged to the shoguns. The Portuguese traded with Japan from 1543 till their exclusion in 1638, and the native Christians were persecuted from 1624. The Tokugawa dynasty of shoguns began in 1603. Japan continued isolated, except for restricted trade with the Dutch, till the American expedition under Perry, 1853, he forced a commercial treaty, March 31, 1854, which was followed by commercial treaties with other countries. The shogunate was abolished in 1867, and a civil war ended in 1868 in the recovery of full power by the Mikado. More recent events are abolition of the feudal system, 1871; annexation of the Bonin Islands, 1876; and of the Loochoo Islands, 1879; suppression of the Satsuma rebellion, 1877; constitution promulgated, 1889; first parliament met, 1890. Area, 147,655 square miles. Population (1891), 40,453,961.

Japheth (ja'feth), or Japhet (ja'fet). According to the account in Genesis, the third son of Noah, and the ancestor of various nations in northern Asia and in Europe (in general, of the so-called Indo-European race). See Shem.

Attempts have been made to explain the names of the three sons of Noah as referring to the colour of the skin. Japheth has been compared with the Assyrian yapētu, 'white;' Shem with the Assyrian samu, 'olive-coloured;' while in Ham etymologists have seen the Hebrew hamu, 'to be hot.' But all such attempts are of very doubtful value.

Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 42.

Two passages in the Old Testament are quoted from it: the famous song which mentions the standing still of the sun (Josh. x. 13) and the lament of David over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 18). It is evident that the work cannot have been completed before the time of David, although the nucleus of the collection may have been in existence earlier. There are several Hebrew works of this title extant, and one forgery which appeared in England in 1751.

Jasmin (zhäs-man'), Jacques. Born at Agen, France, March 6, 1798: died Oct. 4, 1864. A Provençal poet. He was known as the last of the troubadours and the "Barber Poet." His father was a composer of the burlesque comedies used at fêtes, charivaris, etc., and he accompanied him on his expeditions. Put at last in a seminary, he left it abruptly, and was employed in a barber's shop at Agen; later he entered this business on his own account. His first work was called "Charivari" (1825). He also composed a great number of popular songs, patriotic odes, etc., and "Mous Souvenirs" (" My Souvenirs"), written in the patois of Agen, a dialect of the langue d'oc. The first collection of his works was published in 1835 under the title, taken from his profession, "Papillotes." His name reached Paris; he was presented to the king, and received the cross of the Legion of Honor and a pension. In 1852 the Academy granted him a "prix extraordinaire" for his Provençal works. Jataka (jä'ta-ka). [Skt. jātaka, nom. jātakam, nativity, principles of nativity.] Among the Buddhists, a former birth of Shakyamuni, and a narrative regarding it: "Birth-story." The Jatakas are one of the sacred books of the Buddhists, a division of the Khuddakanikaya, or "collection of short treatises," in the Suttapitaka, or discourses for the laity. There is evidence of the existence of a collection so named as early as the council of Vesali (about 380 B. C.). They were put into their present form in the Suttapitaka in the 5th century A. D. There were current among the Buddhists fables and stories which they ascribed to Buddha, but which they sought to increase by identifying the best character in any story with Buddha himself in a former birth. Distinguished by quaint humor and by their earnestness, they teach the duty of tender sympathy with animals. Many, if not all, of the fables of the Hitopadesha may be identified with them. The stories number 550. They have been edited in the original Pali by Fausböll, and are being translated by Rhys Davids and under his superintendence. Rhys Davids terms them "the most important collection of ancient folk-lore extant."

Jatayu (ja-tä'yō). In the Ramayana, a bird, the son of Vishnu's bird Garuda, and king of the vultures. As ally of Rama he fought, to prevent the carrying away of Sita, against Ravana who mortally wounded him. In the Puranas Jatayu is the friend of Dasharatha.

A town in the province of Valencia, Spain, situated on the Albaida 31 miles south by west of Valencia: the ancient Setabis. It has a castle; was noted as Roman times for linen manufactures; and was the birthplace of Pope Alexander VI. and of Ribera. Population (1887), 34,699.

Jats, or Jauts (jäts). A mysterious race, perhaps Hinduized Scythians, first mentioned in the beginning of the 11th century. They opposed the invasion of Mahmud of Ghazni, by whom they were defeated, though they are said to have gathered 8,000 boats on the Indus. In Aurungzeb's reign they were plentiful in the mountains of the interior of India. Increasing in strength under their chief Suraj Mal in the 18th century, they dictated to the Moguls. Suraj Mal himself was killed when hunting in bravado in the imperial park at Delhi, which city he had undertaken to besiege. After a period between the years of Suraj Mal, their power, Ranjit Singh, created the chiefship. When British power was established in northern India, Ranjit Singh was allowed to retain his territories, viz. Jenkins's Ear, War of. The name popularly given to the war between Great Britain and Spain which broke out in 1739, and became merged in the War of the Austrian Succession. Its immediate cause was the appearance of an English mariner, Robert Jenkins, who said (and that he had been tortured by the Spaniards, with the loss of his ear.

Jenne (jen'ne), or Jinne (jin'ne). A town in Sudan, western Africa, situated on the Niger about 350 miles southwest of Timbuktu.

Jenner (jen'er), Edward. Born at Berkeley, Gloucestershire, May 17, 1749; died there, Jan. 26, 1823. An English physician, famous as the discoverer of vaccination. In 1770 he became a pupil of John Hunter in London, and also studied at the same time in St. George's Hospital. In 1773 he began to practise in Berkeley. His investigation of cowpox began very early, and was suggested by the local rustic tradition that the dairymaids who contracted the disease were exempt from smallpox. On May 14, 1796, he vaccinated a boy of eight with lymph from the hand of a dairymaid, and on July 1 inoculated the same boy with smallpox. The experiment was successful; an account of it was published June, 1798. The practice of vaccination gradually gained ground until in 1800 a great part of this time was taken up by the inoculation of Dr. Pugh, until of it, in America. Honors came to him from every quarter, and on June 2, 1802, a grant of £10,000 was made to him by Parliament.

Jenner, Thomas. Flourished 1631–56. An author, engraver, and publisher. In the reigns of Charles I. and Charles II. he kept a print-shop at the Royal Exchange which was frequented by Pepys and Evelyn. Among his works are the "Soul's Solace: with thirty curious copper-plate engravings" (1631), "Directions for the English Traveller" (1645) "A Further Narrative of the Passages of these Times" (1648), "Londo's Blame if not its Shame" (1654). Dict. Nat. Biog.

Jenolan Caves. A group of limestone caves in the Blue Mountains, New South Wales.

Jenyns (jen'inz), Soame. Born at London, Jan. 1, 1704; died there, Dec. 18, 1787. An English miscellaneous writer. In 1742 he entered St. John's College, Cambridge, leaving without a degree in 1725. He published anonymously "The Art of Dancing: a poem" (1727) and a collection of poems (1752). He was returned to Parliament in 1742. In 1757 he published a "Free Enquiry into the Nature and Origin of Evil," and in 1765 "The Objections to the Taxation of our American Colonies by the Legislature of Great Britain briefly considered." His "View of the Internal Evidences of the Christian Religion" was published in 1776. "Jenyns' prose style was regarded by his contemporaries as a model of ease and elegance." Dict. Nat. Biog.

Jephthah (jef'thä). [Heb., 'God] opens' or 'makes free.'] A chieftain and judge of Israel whose history is given in Judges xi.–xii. When he went to battle against the Ammonites, he vowed that whatsoever should come forth from his house to meet him on his return "in peace from the children of Ammon" should be offered up as a burnt-offering. The Ammonites were routed, and as Jephthah returned the first to come out to meet him was his daughter and only child. She consented to the fulfilment of his vow after a respite of two months.

Jephthah. An oratorio by Handel, finished in 1751. It was produced in 1752, and was the last he composed, as he became blind at this time.

Jephthes (jef'thez), or Jephtha. A play by George Buchanan, written between 1539 and 1542.

Jequitinhonha (zhä-kē-tēn-yōn'yä), or Rio Grande do Belmonte (rē'o grän'dā dō bel-mon'tā). A river in Brazil which flows into the Atlantic about lat. 16° S., long. 38° 50' W. Length, about 500 miles; navigable for 84 miles. The Belo Grande, about 100 miles from the mouth, is one of the largest affluents in South America.

Jerace (yä-rä'che), Francesco. Born at Polestina, Calabria, 1853. An Italian sculptor.

Jerba (jer'bä). An island in the Gulf of Cabes, belonging to Tunis; the ancient Meninx. It is known as the island of the lotus-eaters, and was the scene of the passage of 18,000 Christians by the Turks, May 11, 1560. Poole.

Jeremiah (jer-e-mī'ä). [Heb., prob. 'the Lord's appointed (or exalted) one.'] The second of the greater prophets of Israel. He lived and prophesied during the reigns of the kings of Judah from Josiah to Hezekiah (from 629 to about 580 B. C.). The book of his prophecy gives numerous details of his personal history. It is largely occupied with denunciations of the sins of the nation and warnings of evils to come on account of them. Some of his prophetic utterances were accompanied and illustrated by symbolical actions.

Jeremy. A witty valet in Congreve's "Love for Love."

Jerez, Francisco. See Xerez.

Jerez (or Xerez) de la Frontera (thā-reth' dā lä fron-tā'rä). A city in the province of Cadiz, Spain, situated near the Guadalete 14 miles northeast of Cadiz; probably the ancient Asta Regia. It is celebrated for the production and export of sherry wine. It was the scene of a victory of the Saracens under Tarik over the West Goths under Roderic in 711. Alfonso X. reconquered it in the middle of the 13th century. Population (1887), 61,708.

Jerez de los Caballeros (thā-reth' dā lōs kä-bäl-yā'ros). A town in the province of Badajoz, Spain, 39 miles south of Badajoz. Population (1887), 8,953.

Jericho (jer'i-kō). In Bible geography, a city of Palestine, situated west of the Jordan and 11 miles east-northeast of Jerusalem. It was destroyed by Joshua and rebuilt by Ahab; was the residence of Herod the Great; was destroyed by Vespasian, rebuilt by Hadrian, and finally destroyed by the Arabs.

Jermyn (jer'min), Henry, Earl of St. Albans. Born in England about 1600; died at London, Jan., 1684. An English statesman. In 1624 he was attached to the British embassy in Paris, and was returned to Parliament for Liverpool in Dec., 1628, for Bury in 1640. He became vice-chamberlain to the queen. He represented St. Edmondsbury in the Long Parliament, and was involved in the "first army plot" which was discovered by Parliament, March 1641. In the hostilities which followed he was engaged mainly in procuring war material on the Continent. He returned to England in 1643, was wounded at Auburn Chase Sept. 21, 1643, and was raised to the peerage as Baron Jermyn of St. Edmondsbury, Sept. 8. He returned to France with the queen in 1644 and directed her correspondence, the interception of which exposed the king's attempt to procure foreign aid. After the death of Charles I. he remained in France with Charles II. On April 27, 1660, he was created earl of St. Albans. At the Restoration Jermyn received many favors, his success being largely due to his influence with the queen mother. He was made ambassador to Paris, and employed himself in strengthening the influence of Louis XIV.

Jeroboam (jer-ō-bō'am) I. King of Israel 953–927 B. C. (Duncker), son of Nebat of the tribe of Ephraim. He organized a revolt of the ten northern tribes against Rehoboam, and founded the kingdom of Israel (1 K. xi.–xv., 2 Chron. ix.–xv.).

Jeroboam II. King of Israel 790–749 B. C. (Duncker), son of Joash whom he succeeded. He was the most prosperous of the kings of Israel (2 Ki. xii.).

Jerome (je-rom' or jer'om), Saint (Eusebius Hieronymus). [Gr. Ἱερώνυμος, sacred name; L. Hieronymus, It. Girolamo, Girolamo, Sp. Jerónimo, Jerome, Pg. Jeronimo, F. Jérôme, G. Hieronymus.] Born at Stridon, Pannonia, about 340; died at Bethlehem, Sept. 30, 420. A father of the Latin Church. He studied at Rome under Donatus the grammarian and Victorinus the rhetorician. In 373, during a journey through the Orient, he was attacked with a severe illness, on recovering from which he devoted himself to an ecclesiastical life. He became a presbyter at Antioch in 379, and in 382 removed to Rome, where he became secretary to Pope Damasus. After the death of this pontiff he entered a monastery at Bethlehem. He published a Latin version of the Bible, known as the Vulgate (which see), and by his knowledge of Greek and Hebrew introduced the treasures of the Eastern Church into the West. The best edition of his works is that by Vallarsi (1734–42).

Jérôme, King of Westphalia. See Bonaparte.

Jerome in the Wilderness. A painting by Titian, in the Brera at Milan. The solitary figure of the saint is broadly and vigorously treated. The background brings to mind a wild scene in Friuli, with its rocks, pines, and granite cliffs.

Jerome of Prague. Born at Prague, Bohemia, about 1365; burned at Constance, Baden, May 30, 1416. A Bohemian religious reformer, an associate and follower of Huss. He was condemned for heresy by the Council of Constance, 1415–16.

Jeronimo (je-ron'i-mō), or Hieronimo (hi-e-ron'i-mō), The first part of. A play by Thomas Kyd. It was acted in 1588 or 1592. The only version extant was printed in part 8vo. The second part was called "The Spanish Tragedy" (which see). Jeronimo, the hero of both, is an old man, the marshal of Spain, who goes mad with grief over the murder of his son. His ravings were ridiculed by contemporary and later dramatists, and became regular expletives in the slang of the period. Shakspere alludes to this in his "Go by Jeronymy" in his "taming of the Shrew."

The two "Jeronimo" or "Hieronimo" plays were, as has been said, extremely popular, and it is positively known that Jonson himself, and probably others, were employed from time to time to freshen them up. The consequence that the exact authorship of particular passages is somewhat problematical. Both plays, however, display, nearly in perfection, the rant, not altogether unpoetical, always extravagant, from which Shakespere protected the stage. Saintsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 54.

Jerrold (jer'old), Douglas William. Born at London, Jan. 3, 1803; died there, June 8, 1857. An English dramatist, satirist, and humorist. He was the eldest son of Samuel Jerrold, actor, and was brought on the stage when a child. In later life he occasionally acted, but was never inclined to the profession. His education was very slight: his knowledge of Latin, French, Italian, and English literature was largely or entirely self-acquired. From 1813 to 1815 he served as midshipman in the royal navy, which was engaged in operations against Napoleon at Flushing. Returning to London in 1816, he maintained himself as apprentice to a printer, and by contributions to periodical literature. A play, "More Frightened than Hurt," was produced in London April 30, 1821, and later in Paris. "Black-eyed Susan, or All in the Downs," produced June 8, 1829, at the Surrey Theatre, was his first important success. It was brought out also at Paris, and ran for one hundred nights in 1829. In 1830 he undertook the management of the Strand Theatre without success. He now turned his attention to the reviews and magazines, contributing to the "Athenæum," "Blackwood's," etc. He attached himself to "Punch" at its appearance in 1841, and was a constant contributor until his death. His satirical "Story of a Feather" (1844–45) first appeared in "Punch." From 1852 until his death he edited "Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper," which was originally "Douglas Jerrold's Weekly Newspaper." He wrote about 40 plays.

Jerrold, William Blanchard. Born at London, Dec. 23, 1826; died at Westminster, March 10, 1884. An English journalist and author, eldest son of Douglas Jerrold. On the death of his father he succeeded to the editorship of "Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper," which he edited until 1864. He served in the North in the Civil War. His chief work is a "Life of Napoleon III." (1873–82).

Jerry Sneak. See Sneak.

Jersey (jer'zi). The largest, most important, and southernmost of the Channel Islands, capital St. Helier's, situated in lat. 49° 10' N., long 2° 7' W. It exports potatoes, cattle, fruit, oysters, granite, etc. The government is vested in a lieutenant-governor appointed by the British crown, and the "States" or local legislature. It is the Mt. Cenera. Length, 10 miles. Breadth, 5 to 6 miles. Area, 45 square miles. Population (1891), 54,518.

Jersey City. The capital of Hudson County, New Jersey, situated on the Hudson opposite New York. It is the terminus of many railway and steamer lines, and has important manufactures of tobacco, etc. It was formerly called Paulus Hook, and was incorporated as a city of Jersey in 1820, and as Jersey City in 1838. Population (1890), 163,003.

Jerseys (jer'ziz), The. A collective name for East Jersey and West Jersey, into which New Jersey was temporarily divided in 1676.

Jerusalem (je-rö'sa-lem). [Heb. Yerishālēm or Yerishālayim, probably 'city of peace'; in the Assyrian inscriptions Ursalimmu; in the tablets of Tel-el-Amarna Uru-Salim; Gr. Ἱεροσόλυμα, Ἱερουσαλήμ.] The ancient capital of Palestine, regarded by the Jews still as their sacred city, and as a holy city by both Christians and Mohammedans. Its identity with Salem (Gen. xiv. 18) is disputed. It first appears as Jebus, or the city of the Jebusites, from whom David captured it or its site, establishing himself in the "stronghold of Zion," and making it his capital. Its situation was suitable for a national metropolis: it lay in the territory of the mighty tribe of Judah, and virtually in the center of the country, 35 miles from the sea and about 19 from the Jordan, while it was the more secure from being some distance off the great highroad of the nations. It was also a mountain city, situated in the heart of the "hill country," surrounded by limestone hills, and itself on the edge of the chain, its highest point being 2,582 feet above sea-level. Solomon beautified it by erecting the temple as a stable national sanctuary, and otherwise, and surrounded the city with a real wall. The secession of the ten tribes under Solomon's son Rehoboam left Jerusalem the capital of the southern kingdom only. Under Rehoboam it was invaded by the Egyptian king Shishak, and the temple and palace were in part despoiled (about 970 B.C.). Under Jehoram (about 885) the temple was again plundered by Arabian and Philistine hordes. Jehoash, king of Israel, defeating King Amaziah (about 837), made a wide breach in the walls and spoiled the city. Under Uzziah (809–757) Jerusalem and all Judah enjoyed prosperity, but were visited by an earthquake. Hezekiah provided the city with water by means of a subterranean canal; in his reign it was besieged without success by Sennacherib. After Josiah fell in the battle of Megiddo, Judah was at the mercy of Egypt. Jehoiakim, Josiah's successor (596), was carried off in chains to Babylon. Jehoiachin, after a terrible siege of 18 months, again captured Jerusalem (596). The Babylonians now carried off all the treasures that remained; the temple was burned, and the city and land deserted by all but the very poorest class. In 586 Zedekiah, a deserter and traitor, beheld the slaughter of the temple, and a large colony, comprising all classes, returned to Judah. After many delays the temple was finished in 516, and the city and its walls were rebuilt and fortified about 445. In 320 Jerusalem was taken by Ptolemy I. Soter. The high priest Simeon the Just (about 300–270) effected many improvements in the city. In Judas Maccabæus's time the temple was purified and consecrated anew in 165. The city enjoyed prosperity under John Hyrcanus I (135–106), but a struggle for the throne between Aristobulus and Hyrcanus II resulted in Pompey's taking Jerusalem in 63 and reducing it, and in an invasion in 40 by the Parthians. In 37 B.C. Jerusalem was taken by Herod with the aid of the Romans. Herod embellished it with palaces, theaters, gymnasia, etc., and especially by the rebuilding of the temple. He also completed the reconstruction of a fortress built by John Hyrcanus, named Antonia, after Mark Antony. Soon after Herod's death Judæa was reduced to a Roman province, and Jerusalem was often the scene of riots and bloody encounters between the Jews and the Roman soldiery. The oppressive rule of the procurator Gessius Florus, led to resistance which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem. The city, with its triple walls, was besieged first by Cestius Florus in the summer of 66; after two years by the emperors Vespasian and Titus. Within it was ravaged by party quarrels, famine, and pestilence; and at last, after a most heroic resistance, it fell in 70 A.D. Its temple was burned, and it lost forever its political importance. For more than 50 years after its destruction by Titus, Jerusalem ceased to exist. About the time of Hadrian it was refounded as a town on its site, which he named Ælia Capitolina, or simply Ælia, and settled with a colony of veterans. About the same time a revolt under Bar Cochba occurred, in which the Romans massacred Jews and made attempted to rebuild the temple; and it took Julius Severus, the greatest general of his time, two years to recapture it. In the site of the temple two heathen temples were now erected. Jews were forbidden to enter it on pain of death, and a swine was sculptured over the gate leading to Bethlehem. Christian pilgrimages to Jerusalem began as early as the 3d century. Helena, mother of Constantine, visited it in 326, and the empress Eudocia in 438, and numerous churches were erected on the holy places. It was an episcopal see subordinate to Cæsarea till after the Council of Chalcedon (451), when it became an independent patriarchate. It was taken by the Persians in 614, but was regained by Heraclius in 629. In 637 it fell into the hands of the Saracen Omar: it had then about 50,000 inhabitants. In 969 it passed over to Egyptian Fatimites. From 1099 to 1187 it was the capital of the Kingdom of Jerusalem of the Crusaders, who slew most of the Mohammedan and Jewish inhabitants. Captured in 1187 by Saladin, it was surrendered in 1229 to the emperor Frederick II. In 1244 it has been in possession of the Mohammedans, and since 1517 under Turkish rule. In 1800 Napoleon planned the capture of Jerusalem, but gave up his intention. Mehemet Ali, pasha of Egypt, took possession of it in 1832; in 1834 it was seized and held for some time by insurgent Bedouins; and in 1840 it was again restored to the sultan. Modern Jerusalem is a city of the vilayet of Syria, Asiatic Turkey, situated in lat. 31° 47′ N., long. 35° 13′ E. The Christian quarter occupies the north-west of it, the Mohammedan the northeast, the Jewish the south-east, and the Armenian the southwest. It is the residence of the Pasha of Palestine, and is now connected with Jaffa by railway. The most conspicuous edifice is the Haram esh Sherif, on the supposed site of the temple. Population, estimated, about 40,000.

Jerusalem. An opera by Verdi, produced at Paris in 1847.

Jerusalem, Council of. A council of the apostles, elders, and brethren, convened at Jerusalem (Acts xv.), for the settlement of questions that had arisen regarding the recognition of Gentile Christians and the obligation of their being circumcised. The deliverance of the council is given in Acts xv. 23–29.

Already the peace of the flourishing community at Antioch had been disturbed by some of the more zealous converts from Jerusalem, who still asserted the indispensable necessity of circumcision. Paul and Barnabas proceeded as delegates from the community at Antioch; and what is called the Council of Jerusalem, a full assembly of all the apostles then present in the metropolis, solemnly debated this great question.

Milman, Hist. of Christianity, I. 405.

Jerusalem, Kingdom of. A Christian kingdom in Syria, 1100–87, largely under French influence. It was continued as a titular kingdom, now held nominally by the house of Austria.

Jerusalem Chamber. A room at the southwest side of Westminster Abbey, dating from 1376 or 1386. Henry IV. died in this room. The Upper House of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury meets in it. It probably derives its name from tapestries with the history of Jerusalem on them, which hung on the walls.

Jerusalem Coffee House. An old house in Cornhill, London. It is one of the oldest of the newspaper rooms, and is frequented by merchants and captains connected with the commerce of China, India, and Australia.

Jerusalem Delivered, It. Gerusalemme Liberata. An epic poem by Torquato Tasso, relating to the deliverance of Jerusalem from the unbelievers by the Crusaders under Godfrey of Bouillon (published 1581; English translations by Fairfax, 1600, and James, 1865).

Jervis (jer'vis), John, Earl St. Vincent. Born at Meaford, Jan. 9, 1735; died March 14, 1823. An English admiral. He entered the royal navy as able seaman Jan. 4, 1749. Sept. 24, 1757, he was promoted rear-admiral, and in 1790 was returned to Parliament for Wycombe. Feb. 1, 1793, he became vice-admiral, and on July 1, 1795, admiral. On Nov. 29, 1795, he joined the fleet on the coast of Corsica as commander-in-chief. Sept. 25, 1796, he was ordered to abandon Corsica and the Mediterranean and to defend the Channel. To prevent the junction of the allied fleet with the French squadron at Brest, he took up a position off Cape St. Vincent Feb., 1797. On Feb. 14 a battle was fought, resulting in the capture of four Spanish ships. He was at once gazetted to an earldom with the title of St. Vincent. He relinquished his command June 15, 1799. In the summer of 1800 he again assumed office in command of the Channel fleet. In 1801 he became first lord of the admiralty. On the collapse of the Addington ministry and the return of Pitt to power, St. Vincent's retirement from the admiralty became necessary. After the death of Pitt he again entered the service with the acting rank of admiral of the fleet, March, 1806, but was relieved April 24, 1807.

Jervis, Sir John. Born Jan. 12, 1802: died at London, Nov. 1, 1856. An English jurist, lord chief justice of the Common Pleas. He was second cousin of John Jervis, Earl St. Vincent. He studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, and was called to the bar in 1824. From 1836 to 1852 he reported in the Exchequer court. Dec., 1852, he was returned for Chesterton a Liberal in the first reform Parliament. He was appointed solicitor-general at the attorney-general in the same year. July 16, 1850, he was appointed lord chief justice of the Common Pleas. In 1848 were passed three bills which bear his name, regulating the duties of jurisdiction of the peace.

Jesi (yā'sē). A city in the province of Ancona, eastern Italy, situated on the Esino 16 miles west-southwest of Ancona: the ancient Æsis or Æsium. It has a cathedral, and is noted as the birthplace of the emperor Frederick II. Population, about 9,000.

Jests of Gonnella. The jests of the domestic fool of Nicolo d'Este: they were printed in 1506.

Jesuits (jez'ū-its). [So called first, it is said, by Calvin, about 1550; from the name given to the order by its founder, XI. Societas Jesu, the Company (or Society) of Jesus.] The members of the "Society of Jesus" (or "Company of Jesus"), founded by Ignatius Loyola in 1534, and confirmed by the Pope in 1540. Its membership includes two general classes (laymen, or temporal coadjutors, and priests) and six grades: namely, novices, formed temporal coadjutors, approved scholastics formed spiritual coadjutors, the professed of three vows, and the professed of four vows. The professed of the four vows are the most influential class: they form the general congregation, and fill the higher offices; and the leading missions. The general is elected for life by the general congregation. They were expelled from France in 1594; restored in 1603; again expelled in 1764, and for the last time in 1880. They were expelled from Spain in 1767, and at different times from various other countries. In 1773 the order was suppressed by Pope Clement XIV., but it was revived in 1814.

Jesus (jē'zus). [Gr. Iesous, Saviour, from Heb. Jehoshua or Joshua, Jehovah is salvation: used in Acts vii. 45, Heb. iv. 8 for Joshua.] The personal name of the founder of Christianity, often joined with the official name Christ, the Anointed One. See Jesus of Nazareth and Christ Jesus. He is the central figure in the Christian religion, belief in whom as the Son of God and the Savior of men is its distinctive characteristic. His personality has been the subject of much controversy. The Trinitarian doctrine that there is but one God and yet three equal subjects or "persons" in one Godhead is that now accepted generally throughout Christendom. The names of the Father and Son being regarded as the same, as was maintained in the early church by the Homoousians in opposition to the Homoiousians who held that their natures are only similar and the Arian-Anomœans, who held that they are different. According to the narratives of the four gospels, Jesus was born of Mary a virgin of the royal Davidic family of Judah (Luke ii. 4), at Bethlehem; was brought up as a carpenter in the workshop of his reputed father; entered, when about 30 years of age, on a public ministry, traveled for two years chiefly in Galilee, preaching, healing, teaching and working miracles, especially of healing, accompanied more or less by the men whom he had chosen as his disciples; was then taken up to Jerusalem, subjected to an irregular trial on a charge of blasphemy, handed over by the Jews to Pilate, the Roman governor, and ultimately sent by him to execution, died on the cross, was buried, and on the morning of the third day rose again from the dead; was afterward seen of many witnesses; and forty days later ascended into Heaven. The birth of Jesus is now placed by the best authorities a few years before the period from which we reckon our years in the vulgar or Christian era.

Jesus College. A college of Cambridge University, England, founded in 1496 by John Alcock, bishop of Ely, on the site of a Benedictine monastery. The chapel is the old convent church, somewhat cut down: its architecture is Norman and Early English, with some Perpendicular interpolations.

Jesus College. A college of the University of Oxford, founded in 1571 by Queen Elizabeth: originally intended for Welsh students. It was rebuilt in 1621–67, and restored in 1856. The chapel (built 1621) is notable for its wainscoting of panelled oak, and the hall for its magnificent screen.

Jesus Disputing with the Doctors. A painting by Paolo Veronese, in the Royal Museum at Madrid.

Jethro (jeth'rō). [Heb., 'excellence.'] A priest or chief of the Midianites who inhabited the southern point of Sinai, the father of seven daughters, one of whom, Zipporah, was married to Moses. In Ex. iii. 1, Num. x. 29 the name is given as Reuel. Perhaps the latter was his personal name, and Jethro an honorary title, or the discrepancy of the names by may be due to separate and independent narratives. By the advice of Jethro, Moses appointed deputies to judge the people and to share the burden of government with him (Ex. xviii.).

Jeu de Paume (zhē dē pōm). Hall of the. [F., 'tennis.'] A building in Versailles, France. It is famous for the oath to form a constitution sworn here by the representatives of the Third Estate June 20, 1789.

Jeunesse Dorée (zhē-nes'-dō-rā'). [F., 'gilded youth.'] In French history, a band of young men who formed a reactionary faction against the Jacobins after the 9th Thermidor, year 2 (July 27, 1794).

Jevons (jev'onz), William Stanley. Born at Liverpool, Sept. 1, 1835; drowned while bathing near Hastings, Aug. 13, 1882. An English economist and logician. He was the son of a hardware and iron merchant of Liverpool. He entered University College, London, in 1851, and studied chemistry with his cousin, Sir Henry Roscoe. In 1863 he became assayer to the new mint at Sydney, Australia, resigning his appointment in 1859 to return to University College. From 1863 to 1865 he published numerous papers on meteorology and finance. In 1866 appeared his "Pure Logic, or the Logic of Quality apart from Quantity," based on the work of Boole. In 1865 he published a work on the exhaustion of the coal-mines. He was appointed to the chair of logic and political economy at Owens College, Manchester, in 1866, and to the professorship of political economy at University College in 1876. This he resigned in 1880. He published "The Substitution of Similars" (1869), "Studies in Deductive Logic" (1880), "The Principles of Science" (1874), "The Theory of Political Economy" (1871).

Jew, The Wandering. See Wandering Jew, The.

Jewel (jū'el), John. Born May 24, 1522; died at Monkton Farleigh, Sept. 23, 1571. Bishop of Salisbury. He graduated at Oxford in Merton College in 1540, and was elected fellow of Corpus Christi in 1542. On the accession of Mary in 1553, Jewel was deprived of his fellowship, and died to Frankfort March 13, 1555. On Mary's death he returned to England. His letters to Peter Martyr and other friends at this time are a valuable source of historical information. He was appointed a disputant at the Westminster Conference in 1559, preacher at Paul's Cross in June, 1560, and bishop of Salisbury in July, 1560. In 1562 appeared his "Apologia pro Ecclesia Anglicana," the first methodical statement of the Church of England's position against the Church of Rome. Jewel's complete works were collected under the direction of Archbishop Bancroft and published in 1609.

Jew of Malta, The. A play by Marlowe. It was written after 1588, and was frequently acted between 1591 and 1596. It was revived in 1601 and 1633, and in 1818 Kean produced an altered version at Drury Lane. The earliest English edition extant is dated 1633, and was edited, somewhat altered, by T. Heywood. It presents the popular idea of an avaricious, murderous Jew.

The Jew was an older play of "The Jew," named by Stephen Gosson in his "School of Abuse" as setting forth "the greediness of worldly choosers and the bloody minds of usurers," which seem to have been a treatment more or less after the two fables which form the groundwork of Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice." Some years after the death of Marlowe we find either Gosson's play or the existence of a play to which Barabas of "The Jew of Malta" is made one with the Jew of the other play. It has, therefore, some rough features of resemblance to "The Merchant of Venice," and in the course of this piece it is to be observed that Barabas changes his name to Joseph.

Morley, English Writers, X. 117.

Jews (jōz). [From Judah.] Loosely, the Semitic nation that was earlier called Hebrews, Israelites, or the children of Israel; strictly, the people descended from the tribes of Judah and Benjamin (see Judah, Kingdom of). After the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A. D.) these were scattered throughout other countries. They still remain a distinct people, often oppressed and persecuted, but retaining their nationality and distinguished by specific characteristics. Their number at the present time is estimated at little over six millions, five millions of them being in Europe.

Jewsbury (joz'ber-i), Geraldine Endsor. Born at Measham, Derbyshire, in 1812; died Sept. 23, 1880. An English novelist. She was the daughter of Thomas Jewsbury of Manchester. He received the honorary degree of doctor of music in 1877 from Cambridge. He is a master of technic, and his style is recognized as a model both in England and on the Continent.

Joachimites (jō'a-kim-its). The followers or believers in the doctrines of an Italian mystic, Joachim (died about 1200), abbot of Floris. The most important feature of his doctrines was the belief that the history of man will be covered by three reigns: the first, that of the Father, from the creation till the birth of Christ; the second, that of the Son, from the birth of Christ till 1260; and the third, that of the Holy Spirit, from 1260 onward. This last view was developed by his adherents into the belief that a new gospel would supersede the revelation of the Old and New Testaments. These views had many supporters in the 13th century.

Joachimsthal (yō'ä-chims-täl). A mining and manufacturing town in Bohemia, situated in lat. 50° 23′ N., long. 12° 54′ E. Its silver-mines were celebrated in the 16th century. The word thaler, dollar, is derived from this place. Population (1890), commune, 7,046.

Joan, surnamed "The Fair Maid of Kent." [From Joanna.] Born 1328: died at Wallingford Castle, Aug. 7, 1385. The wife of Edward, prince of Wales, "the Black Prince," and mother of Richard II., probably the younger daughter of Edmund of Woodstock, earl of Kent, sixth son of Edward I. In Oct., 1340, the young queen Philippa took charge of her, and she became "in her time the most beautiful of all the kingdom (?) of England and the most lovable" (Froissart). She was first married to Sir Thomas Holland, steward of the household to William de Montacute, second earl of Salisbury. A few months after his death (Dec. 28, 1360) she married the Black Prince. The marriage was celebrated by Simon Islip (whom see), archbishop of Canterbury, at Lambeth, Oct. 10, 1361. Between 1362 and 1371 she was with the prince in Aquitaine, where her two sons Edward and Richard II. were born. The Black Prince died on June 8, 1376, and in January, 1377, Richard became king. At her interposition in 1378 proceedings against Wyclif at Lambeth were arrested. She also exerted all her influence to heal the breach between Richard and John of Gaunt. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Joan, Queen of Scotland, called "Joan of the Tower." Born in the Tower, London, about July, 1321: died Sept. 7, 1362. The fourth and youngest child of Edward II. and Isabella, daughter of Philip IV. of France. In the summer of 1327 Isabella and Mortimer, in the name of Edward III., proposed to Robert Bruce, then besieging Norham, the marriage of his son and heir David to Joan, and the marriage was included among the conditions of the peace concluded at Edinburgh, March 1, 1357. They were married at Berwick, July 17, 1357. The Scots called the princess "Joan Make-peace." The children were crowned at Scone Nov. 24, 1331. When David acceded to the throne of Scotland (Nov. 23, 1332), David and Joan were exiled to Château Gaillard in France until May, 1341, when they returned to Scotland.

Joan. A mythical female pope, supposed to have reigned about 855–858. She is represented as of English descent, although born at Ingelheim or Mainz, and as having fallen in love with a young Benedictine monk, with whom she fled in male attire to Athens. After his death she removed to Rome, where she rose to the rank of cardinal. She was elected pope as John VIII. on the death of Leo IV., and died in childbirth during a public procession.

Joan of Arc (jō-an' or jōn or ärk), F. Jeanne d'Arc or Darc (zhän därk), called "The Maid of Orléans." Born at Domremy, Jan. 6, 1412: died May 30, 1431. The French national heroine. She was the illiterate daughter of a peasant of Domremy in Lorraine. At the time of her appearance in history the English were masters of the whole of France north of the Loire, and the queen mother Isabeau of Bavaria supported her son Henry VI. of England to the throne of France in opposition to her son Charles VII. of France. According to a version of a prophecy by Merlin, which was current in her native province and with which she was undoubtedly familiar, France was to be overwhelmed with calamities, but was to be delivered by a virgin out of the forest of Domremy. She believed that she heard supernatural voices commanding her to liberate France, and eventually gained access to the court of Charles VII., who intrusted her with the command of an army. She raised the siege of Orleans by the English, May 8, 1429, and gained the great victory of Patay, June 18, 1429, with the result that Charles VII. was established at Rheims, where he was consecrated on the following day. Meanwhile the Burgundians were anciently accustomed to hold the coronation ceremonies. She was captured May 24, 1430, while defending Compiègne against the Duke of Burgundy; was sold by the duke to his allies the English; and was burned at the stake as a heretic at Rouen, May 30, 1431.

Joan of Arc. A painting by Bastien-Lepage, in the Metropolitan Museum, New York. The maid, as a coarsely dressed Lorraine peasant girl, leans against an apple-tree amid rustic surroundings, and looks upward with a rapt expression. Above float spectral figures of angels and of knights in armor.

Joanna (jō-an'ä). I. [Fem. of Joannes.] Died 1382. Queen of Naples 1343–82. She procured the murder of her first husband, Andrew, prince of Hungary, in 1345, and in 1346 married Prince Louis of Tarentum. She was expelled by Louis, king of Hungary, who invaded Naples to avenge the death of Andrew, but was restored in 1352. She was captured and put to death by the usurper Charles III. (whom see).

Joanna II. Died 1435. Queen of Naples 1414–1435.

Joash (jō'ash). King of Israel 798–790 B. C. (Duncker), son of Jehoahaz. He expelled the Syrians from his kingdom, and defeated and captured Amaziah, king of Judah, and plundered the temple at Jerusalem.

Joash. King of Judah 837–797 B. C. (Duncker), son of Ahaziah. He was the only prince of the royal house who escaped massacre on the usurpation of the throne by Athaliah (whom see). He was proclaimed by the high priest Jehoiada (whom see), who overthrew Athaliah, in 837. He put to death Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, in anger at being rebuked for restoring the worship of Baal, and was murdered by his own servants during an invasion of the Syrians.

Job (jōb). [Heb. Iyōb.] The hero of a book of the Old Testament named from him. He is a man of great wealth and prosperity, who is suddenly overtaken by dire misfortunes. The story rises to a series of discussions between Job and a number of friends who come to visit him. The problem discussed is whether suffering is always the punishment for sin, and, conversely, whether sin is always followed by punishment. Job asserts his righteousness, and his friends assume that his suffering must be a punishment for sin. A righteous man named Job is mentioned in Ezek. xiv. 14, but it is generally assumed that the book itself is not historical in character. This assumption is found as far back as the Talmud. The authorship has been ascribed to Moses, Jeremiah, Ezra, and other biblical writers. Some modern critics consider it an Israelitish production, and place it directly after the fall of Samaria (721 B. C.), while others hold that it is a product of exile dating from the period of the Babylonian captivity. The work is poetic in form, with a prose prologue and epilogue. Some writers call it a drama, others a didactic lyric. It is held by some that the book in its present form is not the original poem. The prologue and epilogue are considered later additions. The speeches of Elihu (one of the friends) are held to be interpolations made in the interest of orthodox beliefs, and some writers consider still other passages interpolations made from the same point of view. The great literary merit of the book is recognized by all modern writers.

Jocasta (jō-kas'tā). A play by Gascoigne and Francis Kinwelmersh, acted in 1566. It has been supposed to be the only Early English play derived from the Greek, but is really a translation from the Italian of Lodovico Dolce.

Jocaste (jō-kas'tē), or Epicaste (ep-i-kas'tē). [Gr. Ἰοκάστη, Ἐπικάστη.] In Greek legend, the wife of Laius, and mother of Œdipus whom she afterward married. See Œdipus.

Jocelin, or Joscelin (jos'e-lin). Flourished 1200. An English hagiographer, a Cistercian monk of the abbey of Furness in Lancashire, and later of the monastery at Down, northern Ireland. He wrote "Life and Miracles of St. Waltheof of Melrose," "Life of David, King of Scotland," "Life of St. Kentigern," "Life and Miracles of St. Patrick," and was probably the author of a "Life of St. Helen," and a work "De Britonum Episcopis" mentioned by Stow.

Jocelin de Brakelond. Flourished 1200. A native of Bury St. Edmunds, and chronicler of St. Edmund's Abbey. He entered the convent in 1173. His chronicle of the abbey covers the period from 1173 to 1202. The graphic account of the abbot Samson suggested Carlyle's "Past and Present" (1843).

Jochanan ben Zaccai (yō-kā'nan ben zak'ki). The celebrated founder of the school of Jabne (which see), and head of the Jewish community after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. He had a school in Jerusalem. At the outbreak of the revolution he urged the maintenance of peace with Rome. Later he managed to escape from the besieged city into the Roman camp, being carried out of the town as a corpse. He obtained from Vespasian permission to open a school at Jabne, and by his activity he gave discipline as head of the school and president of the Sanhedrim, which likewise took up its abode at Jabne, became the repository and producer of Jewish national life out of the ruins of the state and temple. His last blessing to his disciples surrounding his death-bed was: "May the fear of God influence your actions as much as the fear of man."

Jodelle (zhō-del'), Étienne, Sieur de Lymodin. Born at Paris, 1532; died there, July, 1573. A French dramatic poet, a member of the Pléiade, and the founder of modern French tragedy and comedy. He wrote the tragedies "Cléopâtre captive" (1552), "Didon" (1553), the comedy "Eugène," etc.

He became member of Parliament for Seaford, Sussex, in 1794. He wrote "Philology of the English Language" (1820), "A Widow and no Widow" (produced at the Haymarket July 17, 1779), "The Persian Widow," a tragedy (printed 1756, and acted under the patronage of the Persian ambassador June 2, 1809).

Joel (jō'el). [Heb., 'Jehovah is God.'] The second in order of the minor prophets of Israel. His prophecy, which consists of 3 chapters, is spoken partly in his own name and partly in that of Jehovah. It forecasts judgments that are to come in Israel, exhorts the people to repentance and reform, and promises ultimate blessings. Its date has been much disputed.

Jogues (zhōg), Isaac. Born at Orléans, France, Jan. 10, 1607: killed at Caughnawaga, N. Y., Oct. 18, 1646. A French Jesuit missionary. He entered the order of the Jesuits in 1624; was ordained priest in 1636; and in the same year went to Canada, being sent there as a missionary to the Hurons. He was captured in 1642 by the Mohawks, but escaped with the assistance of the Dutch in 1643. In 1646 he voluntarily returned to the Mohawks, with a view to establishing a mission; but was looked upon as a sorcerer and killed. He wrote a "Narrative of New Netherland, A. D. 1643," and René Goupil," and a "Journal" of his captivity, which have been published in the "Collections of the New York Historical Society."

Johanna. See Joanna.

Johanna (jō-han'ä) Island, or Anjouan (än-zō-än'), or Anjuan (än-jō-än'). One of the Comoro Islands, situated in Mozambique Channel, east of Africa, in lat. 12° 16′ S., long. 44° 25′ E. It is governed by a sultan residing at the head town, Johanna. Population (estimated), 12,000.

Johannot (zhō-ä-nō'), Alfred. Born at Offenbach, March 21, 1800: died at Paris, Dec. 7, 1837. A French historical painter. He was first known as the engraver of the pictures of Vernet and Ary Scheffer.

Johannot, Tony. Born at Offenbach, Nov. 9, 1803: died at Paris, Aug. 4, 1852. A French historical painter and engraver, brother of Alfred.

John (jon), the Apostle. [Early mod. E. also Jon; also, after the L., Johan; ME. Jon with long vowel, as in the gen. Jones, whence the mod. surname Jones), also Johan, Jo, OF. Johan, Johan, Jean, F. Jean, Sp. Juan, Pg. João, It. Giovanni, Gianni, Gian, D'Jan, G. Johann, Russ. Ivan, etc., from LL. Joannes, Johannes, Gr. Ἰωάννης, Heb. Yehohānān (in Eng. O. T. Johanan), 'the Lord graciously gave.' The form Jack, often used as a familiar substitute for John, is really a short form of Jacob.] One of the three disciples of Jesus who were admitted to closest intimacy with him, preëminently "the disciple whom Jesus loved." He was the son of Zebedee, and originally a fisherman. His brother James and he are designated as "Boanerges," sons of thunder, and leaned on the bosom of Jesus at the last supper, and was present at the crucifixion, when Jesus committed his mother to John's special care. He is generally believed to have been the author of the gospel and the three epistles that bear his name, and also of the Apocalypse or Revelation, though the question of the authorship of all these has more or less been matter of discussion. Early ecclesiastical traditions tell that, after an enforced or voluntary exile to the isle of Patmos, he returned to Ephesus, and died there at a great age.

John, The Gospel of. The fourth gospel, the authorship of which is generally attributed to the apostle John. It has very much less in common with the other three gospels than they have with each other. Its main purpose is set forth in the book itself: "These are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that, believing, ye might have life through his name" (xx. 31). While it is largely narrative, the discourses and sayings of Jesus have prominence (see especially xiv.–xvii.). The date usually assigned to it is from 80 to 90 A. D.

John, the Baptist. Born about 5 (?) B. C.: beheaded about 30 A. D. The forerunner of Jesus, and the last of the Hebrew prophets.

John I., Saint. Pope 523–526. He was a native of Tuscany, and was elected on the death of Hormisdas. In 525 he was sent by Theodoric, king of the East Goths, at the head of an embassy to the Byzantine emperor to obtain toleration for the Arians, in which he was only partially successful. He was suspected by Theodoric of having secretly opposed the object of the mission, and was on his return thrown into prison, where he died. He is commemorated in the Roman Catholic church on May 27.

John II., surnamed Mercurius (on account of his eloquence). Pope 532–535.

John III. Pope 560–573. During his pontificate Italy was ravaged by frequent incursions of the Lombards.

John IV. Pope 640–642. He was a native of Salona in Dalmatia, and condemned the Monothelitic formula of faith prepared by Sergius at the instance of the emperor Heraclius.

John V. Pope 685–686. He was a native of Antioch in Syria.

John VI. Pope 701–705.

John VII. Pope 705–707.

John VIII. Pope 872–882, a Roman by birth. He crowned the emperors Charles the Bald (875) and Charles the Fat (881), and paid tribute to the Saracens.

John IX. Pope 898–900.

John X. Pope 914–928. He was elevated through the influence of his mistress Theodora, a courtezan at Rome. He defeated the Saracens near the Garigliano in 916.

John XI. Born 906: died 936. Pope 931–932, son of Marozia (whom see) and Pope Sergius III. He was deposed by his brother Alberic, and died in prison.

John XII. Died 964. Pope 955–963, son of Alberic II., patrician of Rome, and grandson of Marozia (whom see). He called to his aid against Berengarius II. of Italy, Otto I. of Germany, whom he crowned emperor in 962. He presently conspired against the emperor, however, and was deposed by John VIII.

John XIII. Pope 965–972.

John XIV. Pope 983–984. He was elected, through the influence of the emperor Otto II., to succeed Benedict VII., but was imprisoned by the antipope Boniface VII. in 984, and died probably by poison.

John XV. Pope 985–996.

John XVI. (Philagathus). Antipope 997–998. He was elevated by Crescentius on the expulsion of Gregory V. in 997, but was imprisoned and blinded by the emperor Otto III. in 998.

John XVII. (Sicco). Pope 1003.

John XVIII. (Fanasus or Fasanus). Pope 1003–09.

John XIX. Pope 1024–33.

John XXI. (or XX.). Pope 1276–77.

John XXII. (Jacques d'Euse). Bornat Cahors, France, about 1244: died 1334. Pope 1316–34. He made his residence at Avignon, and was wholly subservient to the interests of the French court. He opposed the emperor Louis the Bavarian, whose imperial dignity he offered to Charles the Fair; Louis, however, installed Nicholas V. as antipope at Rome in 1328, but on retiring from Italy was unable to prevent Nicholas from falling into the hands of John.

John XXIII. (Baltasare Cossa). Born at Naples about 1360: died at Florence, Nov. 22, 1419. Pope 1410–15. He served as a corsair in his youth; afterward studied at the University of Bologna; was created a cardinal in 1402; and in 1410 succeeded Alexander V., whose death he is suspected of having encompassed. He was opposed by the antipopes Benedict XIII. and Gregory XII., along with whom he was deposed by the Council of Constance in 1415.

John (Sp. Juan (hō-än')) I. Born Dec. 27, 1350: died 1395. King of Aragon 1387–95, son of Pedro IV.

John (Sp. Juan) II. Born June 29, 1397: died Jan. 20, 1479. King of Aragon 1458–79, son of Ferdinand I.

John (Sp. Juan) I. Born in Aug., 1358: died 1390. King of Castile 1379–90, son of Henry II.

John (Sp. Juan) II. Died in June, 1454. King of Castile 1406–54.

John, G. Johann (yō'hän), surnamed "The Blind." Born about 1296: killed at the battle of Crécy, Aug. 26, 1346. King of Bohemia 1310–1346. He fought at the battle of Mühldorf in 1322.

John, surnamed Lackland. Born probably at Oxford, Dec. 24, 1167: died at Newark, Oct. 19, 1216. King of England 1199–1216, son of Henry II. and Eleanor. He ascended the English throne on the death of his brother Richard I. without issue. His succession was recognized also in the duchy of Normandy, but the lords of Anjou, Maine, and Touraine declared according to their custom of inheritance, in favor of Arthur as the son of another brother. Having put Arthur to death, in 1202, his French fiefs were declared forfeited by Philip II. of France, who took Chateau Gaillard, the last of them, shortly before in France, March 6, 1204. On the death of Hubert Walter, archbishop of Canterbury, in 1205, a disputed election for the archbishopric was followed by a reference to Rome, which resulted in the election of Stephen Langton by the command of Pope Innocent III. in 1207. John refused to recognize the new archbishop, and England was laid under an interdict in 1208. In 1212 the Pope issued a bull deposing John and intrusting the execution of the deposition to Philip II. of France. John made his peace with the Pope by consenting to hold his kingdom in fief from the Pope and to pay an annual tribute of 1,000 marks (May 15, 1213). He thereupon invaded France in alliance with the emperor Otto IV., the Flemish, and others, but was defeated with his allies at Bouvines in 1214. In the mean time the barons, with whom he had been embroiled ever since his accession by his exactions and misgovernment, had combined to secure a reform in the government, and on his return he was compelled to sign the Magna Charta (which see) at Runnymede, June 15, 1215. He appealed to the Pope, who declared the charter void. The barons retorted by declaring the crown forfeited and bestowed it upon Louis, son of Philip II. of France, who landed in England in 1216. John died during the ensuing war, and his opponents death preserved the crown for his son Henry III.

John (F. Jean) II., surnamed "Le Bon" ("the Good"). Died at London, April 8, 1364. King of France 1350–64, son of Philip VI. He was defeated and captured by the British under the Black Prince at Poitiers in 1356, and was restored to liberty by the peace of Bretigny in 1360.

John (Pg. João) I., surnamed "The Great." Born at Lisbon, April 22, 1357: died Aug. 11, 1433. King of Portugal 1385–1433, illegitimate son of Pedro I. He became grand-master of Avis in 1364, and was in 1385 elected to succeed his legitimate brother Ferdinand I. to the exclusion of Ferdinand's daughter Beatrice, wife of John I. of Castile. John of Castile sought to enforce his wife's claim, but suffered a decisive defeat at Aljubarrota, Aug. 14, 1385. John the Great married Philippa, daughter of John, duke of Lancaster.

John II., surnamed "The Perfect." Died in Oct., 1495. King of Portugal 1481–95, son of Alfonso V. During his reign Bartholomew Dias discovered the Cape of Good Hope (1486).

John III. Born at Lisbon, 1502: died 1557. King of Portugal 1521–57, son of Emanuel I. He introduced the Inquisition about 1526.

John IV., surnamed "The Fortunate." Died Nov. 6, 1656. King of Portugal 1640–56. He headed the revolution against Spain, whose authority he threw off, although the independence of Portugal was not formally recognized before 1668. He was the first of the house of Braganza.

John V. Born at Lisbon, Oct. 22, 1689: died July 31, 1750. King of Portugal 1706–50, son of Pedro II.

John VI. Born at Lisbon, May 13, 1769: died there, March 26, 1826. King of Portugal 1816–1826, son of Queen Maria I. He assumed in 1799 the title of regent for his mother, to whom he succeeded in 1816. Expelled by the French in 1807, he transferred the government to Brazil, where he resided until 1821.

John III. Born 1537: died Nov. 17, 1592. King of Sweden 1568–92, second son of Gustavus Vasa. He deposed and murdered his brother Eric XIV., whom he succeeded.

John II. Casimir. Born March 21, 1609: died at Nevers, France, Dec. 16, 1672. King of Poland 1648–68, son of Sigismund III. He succeeded his stepbrother Ladislaus, and waged war with Sweden and Russia, with varying success, he concluded peace at Oliva May 3, 1660, and Andrussov Jan. 20, 1667, respectively. He abdicated Sept. 16 1668.

John III. Sobieski. Born at Olesko, Galicia, June 2, 1624: died June 17, 1696. King of Poland 1674–96. He brought an army of 20,000 Poles to the relief of Vienna, before which he gained a celebrated victory over the Turks Sept. 12, 1683.

John, surnamed "The Fearless." Born about 1370: assassinated 1419. Duke of Burgundy, son of Philip the Bold whom he succeeded in 1404. He assassinated the Duke of Orléans in 1407, and was at strife with the dauphin (Charles VII.).

John, G. Johann, surnamed "The Constant." Born June 30, 1468: died Aug. 16, 1532. Elector of Saxony, co-regent with his brother Frederick the Wise until the death of the latter (May 5, 1525). He was the protestant leader at Spires 1529, and in the Smalkaldic League 1530.

John, Don. 1. In Shakspere's comedy "Much Ado about Nothing," the bastard brother of Don Pedro of Aragon.—2. In Beaumont and Fletcher's comedy "The Chances," a hare-brained but honorable Spanish gentleman.

John, Eugénie: pseudonym E. Marlitt. Born at Arnstadt, Thuringia, Germany, Dec. 5, 1825. A German novelist. Among her novels is "Goldelse" (1866).

John, Prester. See Prester John.

John of Austria, generally called Don Juan or John of Austria. Born at Ratisbon, Bavaria, Feb. 24, 1547: died near Namur, Belgium, Oct. 1, 1578. A celebrated Spanish general, illegitimate son of the emperor Charles V. by Barbara Blomberg. He defeated the Moriscos in Granada 1569–1570; gained a naval victory over the Turks at Lepanto Oct. 7, 1571; captured Tunis 1573; and was governor of the Netherlands from 1576 until his death. He granted the "perpetual edict" in 1577, and in 1578 declared war against the insurgent provinces under William of Orange.

John of Beverley, Saint. Died at Beverley, Yorkshire, 721. An English prelate, bishop of Hexham, and archbishop of York 687.

John of Beverley. Born at Beverley, Yorkshire: executed at St. Giles's Fields, Jan. 19, 1414. An English Carmelite theologian, identified with John of Beverley, the Lollard.

John of Bologna. [F. Jean de Boulogne, It. Giovanni da Bologna.] Born at Douai about 1524: died at Florence, 1608. A celebrated Italian sculptor. He was surnamed by the Italians "Il Fiamminga," from his birth in the Low Countries. He went to Rome when quite young, and submitted work to Michelangelo. After two years he settled in Florence. The great fountain of Neptune in Bologna was begun in 1563, and finished in 1566. From this he derived his name. The date of the "Mercury," now in Florence, his most popular statue, is not known. He also made the "Rape of the Sabines" in the Loggia dei Lanzi, the equestrian statue of Cosmo I. in the Piazza della Signoria, the fountain in the Boboli Gardens (all at Florence), and the statue of the Appennines at Pratolino; a charming statuette of Venus on a fountain at Petraja; and the bronze doors of the cathedral at Pisa.

John of Damascus (John Damascene or Joannes Damascenus), surnamed Chrysorrhoas. Born at Damascus at the end of the 7th century: died about 760 (?). A theologian and father of the Eastern Church. He is the reputed author of the romance "Barlaam and Josaphat." His works were published at Venice, 1731.

John of Gamundia. See the extract.

> John of Gamundia was a mathematician and professor of astronomy. At his death, in the year 1442, he was chancellor of the University of Vienna. The calendars made by him were highly esteemed, and were engraved and printed for many years after his death. In his researches after old prints, the late R. Z. Becker, of Gotha, discovered one of the original blocks of a placard or poster edition of the Calendarium, which he has communicated. It measures about 10 inches wide, 15 inches long, and 12 inches thick. The block was engraved on both sides.

John of Gaunt (corrupted from Ghent), Duke of Lancaster. Born at Ghent, March, 1340: died at London, Feb. 3, 1399. The fourth son of Edward III. In 1342 he was created earl of Richmond, and in 1359 married his cousin Blanche, second daughter of Henry, duke of Lancaster. On the death of Henry (March, 1361) and his daughter Maud (September, 1362) he succeeded by right of his wife to the rank and possessions of the Dukes of Lancaster. In 1367 he accompanied the Black Prince on the Spanish campaign. Blanche died in 1369, and in 1371 he married Constance, eldest daughter of Pedro the Cruel, the deposed king of Castile. Returning to England in 1372, he styled himself King of Castile by right of his wife. He assisted considerably in the war then waging with France, but although a brave knight he was never a competent general, and his repeated failures contributed much to his increasing unpopularity. The Black Prince died June 8, 1376, and the Good Parliament, which under his patronage had undertaken to reform abuses, was dissolved. In 1377 he was superseded in the command by the hands of Lancaster. His most powerful opponent, William of Wykeham, was disgraced. In the struggle with the clerical party Lancaster was driven to an alliance with Wycliffe, especially Wyclif whom he defended before the convocation at St. Paul's, Feb. 19, 1374. His hostil behavior excited a riot in London; his palace, the Savoy, was attacked, and he was forced to take refuge with Prince Richard and his mother, the widow of the Black Prince, at Kennington. Edward III. died June 21, 1377, and Richard II. succeeding, the master of the royal power declined. He was engaged in futile expeditions to France and Scotland. While absent in the north his extreme unpopularity was shown by the destruction of his palace of the Savoy in Wat Tyler's insurrection, June 13, 1381. Richard II. created him duke of Aquitaine March 2, 1390, and he assisted in negotiating the French treaty May 24, 1394.

John of Gaza, a Cardinal. One of the Popes and leaders in the Judean war with Rome. He first gathered an army of volunteers, and fortified himself in his native place, Gischala, a small city in Galilee. Driven out by Titus, he fled to Jerusalem, and became one of the leading and ruling spirits, distinguishing himself by undaunted courage, heroism, and military ability. He had at last to grace the triumphal procession of Titus, and perished in prison at Rome.

John o' Groat's (jon ō grōts) House. A locality in the county of Caithness, Scotland, in lat. 58° 38′ N., long. 3° 4′ W., near the northeastern extremity of the island of Great Britain.

John of Hexham. Flourished 1180. An English historian, prior of Hexham before 1178. He continued the chronicle of Symeon of Durham over a period extending from 1130-54. It deals mainly with the church in the north of England.

John of Lancaster, Duke of Bedford. Born June 20, 1389: died at Rouen, Sept. 14, 1435. Regent of England and France. He was the third son of Henry IV. of England by Mary, daughter of Humphrey Bohun, earl of Hereford. He was knighted at his father's coronation as one of the original knights-companions of the Bath, and in 1403 was made constable of England and warden of the East Marches. In May, 1414, he was created duke of Bedford and earl of Kendal, and later earl of Richmond. He commanded the troops in the north until the death of Henry IV (March, 1413). On Aug. 14, 1416, the fleet under his command won the great victory over the French in the Channel, and succeeded in relieving the besieged town of Harfleur; and in 1417 his expedition into Scotland was successful. At the death of Henry V. (Aug., 1422) he assumed the regency. To secure the alliance of Philip, duke of Burgundy, Bedford married his daughter Anne in 1423. His administration of France continued both successful and beneficial until the siege of Orléans (Oct. 12, 1428), which marks the appearance of Joan of Arc and the decline of English supremacy. Charles VII. was crowned king of France at Rheims July 17, 1429, and Joan of Arc unsuccessfully assaulted Paris Sept. 8, 1429. She was betrayed to the English, and executed May 30, 1431. Anne, duchess of Bedford, died Nov. 13, 1432, and Bedford sacrificed the alliance of Philip, duke of Burgundy, by marrying Jacqueline, daughter of Pierre, count of St. Pol, April 20, 1433. Philip entered into an alliance with the French king, thus thwarting Bedford's hopes, and terminating the French dominion of the English king.

John of Leyden (properly Johann Bockelson or Bockold). Born at Leyden about 1510: put to death at Münster, Westphalia, Jan. 23, 1536. An Anabaptist fanatic. He succeeded Matthiesen as leader of the Anabaptists in Munster 1534, revolutionized the city, and established a theocracy or Kingdom of Zion, of which he was crowned king. He was imprisoned by the bishop of Münster in 1535. He is the subject of Meyerbeer's opera "Der Prophet."

John of London, or John Bever. Died 1311. An English chronicler, monk of Westminster Abbey. He wrote the short but valuable "Commendatio lubilis in transitum Magni Regis Edwardi Quarti." He is supposed to have been the author of "Flores Historiarum" (from 1265 to 1290).

John of Luxemburg. See John, King of Bohemia.

John of Peterborough. Flourished 1380. The alleged author of the "Chronicon Petroburgense," probably an imaginary person.

John of Salisbury, surnamed Parvus ("the Little"). Born at Salisbury, Wiltshire, England, about 1110: died at Chartres, France, Oct. 25, 1180. A noted English ecclesiastic, scholar, and author, bishop of Chartres. In 1136 he went to Paris to attend the lectures of Abelard. He also studied with Alberic of Rheims, Robert of Melun, and William of Conches. At Chartres he had the benefit of his classical scholarship. In 1141 he returned to Paris to study theology under Master Gilbert de la Porree, Robert Pullus, and Simon de Poissy. In 1147 he attended the council held by Eugenius III. at Rheims, and followed the Pope to Rome. From 1150–64 he lived at the court of Canterbury with Archbishop Theobald. He was repeatedly intrusted with delicate affairs of state, and frequently visited the papal court in Italy. His close alliance with the bishops brought him into disfavor with Henry II., which obliged him to abandon England in 1163 and the shelter of Paris. He later returned to Canterbury, and was present at the murder of Archbishop Thomas Becket. His works consist of his letters, "Polycraticus," "Metalogicus," "Historia Pontificalis," "Vita Sancti Anselmi," "Vita Sancti Thomæ Cantuar.," "Historia Pontificalis." His collected works have been edited by Giles (1848).

John (G. Johann) Baptist Joseph Fabian Sebastian, Archduke of Austria. Born at Florence, Jan. 20, 1782: died at Gratz, Styria, May 10, 1859. An Austrian general, younger son of the emperor Leopold II. He was made commander-in-chief of the Austrian army in the Tyrol in 1800, and was defeated by the French under Moreau at Hohenlinden, Dec. 3, 1800. In 1809 he obtained command of the Austrian army in Italy, and gained a victory over the viceroy Eugene at Sacile, April 16, but was defeated at Raab June 14, 1809. He commanded on the Rhine in 1815, and was chosen administrator of the empire by the German National Assembly in 1848.

John Frederick (jon fred'ėr-ik), G. Johann Friedrich, surnamed "The Magnanimous." Born at Torgau, Prussia, June 30, 1503: died at Jena, March 3, 1554. Elector of Saxony, son of John the Constant whom he succeeded in 1532. He was one of the leaders of the Smalkaldic League. At Mühlberg, April 24, 1547, he was defeated by the emperor Charles V., captured, and forced to renounce the electorate. See Mühlberg.

John George I., G. Johann Georg. Born March 5, 1585: died at Dresden, Oct. 8, 1656. Elector of Saxony, in the Albertine line, second son of the elector Christian I. and Sophia, princess of Brandenburg. He succeeded his brother Christian II. in 1611.

John George II., G. Johann Georg. Born May 31, 1613: died at Dresden, Aug. 22, 1680. Elector of Saxony, eldest son of John George I. whom he succeeded in 1656.
